WHITAKER, Jno. H., Slatersville, R. I., has just received from his church a handsome oak library desk and Morris chair.
WILLIAMS, Samuel, and his wife, Riverton, Neb., on their wedding anniversary were tendered an enthusiastic reception, at which numerous tokens of esteem were given Mr. and Mrs. Williams.

TICKETS to Chicago and return are on sale via the Hoosac Tunnel Route, good going July 3-6, and returning until July 12th inclusive, at one limited fare for the round trip.

DEMOCRATS take heed, the Fitchburg Railroad is the short line to Chicago, and is the only line offering the choice of three routes. Lowest rates Call at 250 Washington Street for particulars.

AN UNUSUAL CHAIR.—If any of our readers are interested in the old-fashioned, rush-bottom chairs which our great-grandmothers used three generations ago, the chance is now offered not merely to see but to own one of them at trifling cost. The Paine Furniture Co. have reproduced a few of these old chairs, and are selling them at the cost of ordinary cheap bedroom chairs. It is a great chance for some one while they last.

CHURCH REMODELING.
THOMAS W. SILLOWAY, Church Architect,
10 Park Square, Boston.
Mr. Silloway's long practice in building or remodeling over 400 church edifices enables him to save and utilize all the valuable parts, and for a comparatively small outlay produce a building preferable to a new one of much greater cost. He proposes to continue the work of remodeling as a specialty, and tenders his services to committees who would practice economy, and where the means are limited.

NOW READY.

The Life, Letters, and Journals of the Rev. and Hon. PETER PARKER, M. D. Missionary, Physician, and Diplomatist.

By the Rev. GEORGE B. STEVENS, D. D.
Cloth, pages 362, price $1.50 net.

It was not a foolish self-conceit which led Peter Parker to make provision in his will that his biography should be published under the direction of Yale University. The life was so full of interesting incident, so glowing with lofty purpose, and so brilliant in successful accomplishment that it had been a shame to leave the book unwritten. As the founder of medical missionary work in China, as the invaluable helper of the first diplomatic agents of the United States in the Celestial kingdom, as the holder of high official positions and the possessor of the highest esteem of both Chinese and Americans, Dr. Parker's record is that of a singularly useful and successful life. The story has been well woven together, and those who read it will find something of the secret of the power of the notable man whose life it records.

ADONIRAM JUDSON GORDON

A Biography. By his son. With portraits and other illustrations. 8vo, cloth, $1.50.

"We shall be greatly disappointed if the life of the late Dr. A. J. Gordon be not immediately recognized as one of the best biographies that has been written during the last twenty-five years. In point of view, both of completeness and of style, it leaves nothing to be desired. The author, Mr. Ernest B. Gordon, is a worthy son of his father, whose life he has had the good fortune to chronicle. . . . His powers of graphic description are extraordinary."—New York Examiner.

HEATHER FROM THE BRAE

Scottish Character Sketches. By DAVID LYALL. 16mo, cloth decorated, 75 cents.

David Lyall has attracted much attention recently in Great Britain, and it is generally admitted that he has earned a place alongside of Maclaren, Crockett, and Barrie. He has the gift, which seems to belong only to those who hail from the land of the heather, of investing Scottish character with the charm and truthfulness of reality; but while he is thus comparable with the writers named, he has a genre of his own, which gives charm and individuality to his work.

"THE MAN CHRIST JESUS"

Studies. By ROBERT E. SPEER. 16mo, cloth, 75 cents.

This is not a life of Christ but a study of what Christ was, His character, His spirit, Himself, studied with reference to its testimony to His divinity and to its revelation of what God means each disciple of Christ to be. Its chapters have found the most ready acceptance in their original form of addresses to Bible classes at Northfield, Princeton, and elsewhere.

Steps for Beginners.

A Manual of instruction for persons seeking the Way of Life and admission into the membership of the Church of our Lord Jesus Christ. By ASHER ANDERSON. Paper. Pp. 69. 12 cents; $10 per 100 copies.

Mr. Anderson's little volume is the result of his own practical experience in preparing young people to enter the membership of the church. It is a simply written little manual, free from theological technicalities, but full of suggestion and very clear in its pointing out of the great fundamentals of Christian truth. Some pastors prefer to prepare their own course of instruction for such persons as they can reach in this way, but there will be many others who can use Mr. Anderson's manual to good advantage, and no one who is interested in work of this kind can fail to be helped by a reading and careful study of the book. It is a good thing, too, to be put into the hands of any one who is beyond the reach of immediate personal effort, but who may be led by the clear statements of the manual to find with its aid the greatest of all blessings.

FAR beyond every anticipation has been the warmth of welcome extended to The Congregationalist pilgrims during the three weeks that they have been in England. We were apprised in advance of various preparations that were being made in different cities, but letters from members of the party show that they are almost overwhelmed by the abundance and continuousness of the hospitalities extended to them. An account is given elsewhere of the festivities in Plymouth, where the party landed, and the various functions there seem to have been but the forerunner of similar attentions from mayors and others high in civic positions, from dignitaries of the Church of England, and from leaders and from the rank and file of the Congregational body. The party has been this week in Scrooby and vicinity. The most notable feature of their stay in that region was the laying, on Monday, of the corner stone of the John Robinson Memorial Church at Gainsborough. In this service Hon. T. F. Bayard and a large delegation of English men and women had an important part. If our pilgrims maintain this rapid pace and continue to be the recipients of so much attention, they will hardly look upon their trip as a vacation, though we presume most of them are entirely willing to endure the special strain in order that they may avail themselves of the remarkable opportunities at their disposal.

For sustained interest, punctuality and regularity of attendance, and its quiet but pervasive spiritual tone, the International Sunday School Convention in this city last week need not fear comparison either with preceding gatherings of the same nature or with great religious assemblages of any sort. Much of the success of the four days' meetings was due to the efficient committee of thirty, in whose hands were the preliminary arrangements. Mr. S. B. Capen's judicious and energetic discharge of his onerous duties as presiding officer was another important factor, while the temper of the delegates was so uniformly considerate and Christian that the work of the convention moved forward smoothly and to a happy outcome. Earnestness and seriousness were written on almost every countenance. The delegates came not for a holiday or for a dress parade, but to learn how to present Christian truth to their pupils more effectively and how to make their own schools centers of larger influence.

The only issue which at all divided the delegates related to the instructions which should be given the Lesson Committee in reference to the selection of passages on temperance. It is understood that the committee would prefer not to be bound down by restrictions that would require it to introduce every quarter a special temperance lesson. Its preference would be to make this subject prominent whenever it appears in the natural progress of a given series of lessons. There was animated debate on the floor of the convention, but finally the instructions given to the committee at St. Louis three years ago were reaffirmed. These require four temperance lessons for every year. It is a difficult task thus enjoined upon the committee, and we should not be surprised if three years hence the action is reversed.

Harvard University conferred the degree of Master of Arts upon Booker T. Washington of Tuskegee last week. Sanders Theater rang with enthusiastic applause as the fact was made known and the degree was conferred, and later, at the banquet, Mr. Washington, in a manly speech, revealed those qualities as a man and orator which have given him the right to a title so honorable. The title of D. D. conferred by Harvard on John H. Vincent, not only testifies to the success he has had as a preacher to Harvard's students during the past two years, but it is a fitting recognition by our oldest university of the service Bishop Vincent rendered to the world when he founded the Chautauqua system of popular instruction and culture. The commendable custom of announcing why honorary degrees are conferred is gaining ground in our colleges. In some instances it solves a problem which otherwise would be insoluble, but, on the whole, the degrees this year seem to have been most worthily bestowed.

Dartmouth has abandoned the old method of granting the degree of A. M. in course to graduates of three years' standing, and bestows it now only upon those who have taken a prescribed two years' course of study, one year of which, at least, must be spent at Hanover. At this year's Commencement degrees were conferred on this plan for the first time. Three persons passed the required examinations, which were decidedly rigid. One of the three was Miss Katharine M. Quint, B. A., Wellesley, 1890. The noticeable feature in her case is the fact that she is the first woman ever admitted to any department of Dartmouth. Her application was not successful until after a year's consideration by the trustees. She was bright enough to appeal to that clause in the charter of the college which allows its privileges to "English youth and others," she arguing that if she were not an "English youth" she came under the category of "others." Her specialties were Greek, and American literature, and her scholarship was pronounced to be of the highest order. We understand that Miss Quint's presence in the institution during the past year, as well as that of a fellow woman student, a niece of Dr. H. A. Hazen, who has not yet completed her course, excited no special attention after the first few days, and that both received the utmost courtesy. It will be observed that the admission of women is simply to the graduate departments of graduates from other colleges without distinction of sex. We learn from Hanover that when Miss Quint came modestly forward in her Wellesley cap and gown to receive her degree from President Tucker the applause was unbounded. It was a happy coincidence that her father's class held its fiftieth anniversary at this Commencement, twelve out of fourteen survivors being present. The class recognized the occasion by adopting Miss Quint as an honorary member.

It seems to us that the action taken last week at the New Haven council and reviewed in our church news columns was wise and careful. There is, however, the further consideration that the advice of a dismissing council is of great importance as certifying to the good standing of the minister and furnishing him with credentials which are of great value to a subsequent installing council. It would, perhaps, have been well to add a vote to the effect that the evidence of good standing which would have been given by a result of council commending him to the churches, and of the certainty that his departure was not caused by anything calculated to throw doubt upon the brother's work, was supplied from other sources and so accepted by the installing council. There have been cases where the absence of a dismissing council has been only too suggestive of the fact that the departing minister could not have obtained any certificate that he deserved the future confidence of the churches.

He had dropped the cares of an engrossing business to run up to his alma mater for a taste of the Commencement festivities. Upon his heart as he went rested not only the weight of the daily burden, but a burning resentment against one who had recently done him a wrong. But as he breathed for a day the atmosphere of his old college home a different temper of mind began to steal over him. Was it the quiet beauty of the encircling hills that wrought this change? Was it the merry shouts of the buoyant collegians? Was it the memories of his own undergraduate days, now a quarter of a century distant, the recollection of the high ho es and the noble ideals with which he, in his time, had gone forth into the great world? Perhaps all these influences had their share in softening the heart of this man. At any rate the first thing he did on returning to his office was to write to the one against whom his feeling had been excited a letter fragrant with charity and forgiveness. He is not sorry now that he snatched a day from business in which to drink again at the fountains which once fed his truest life and which still minister to that which is best in him.

THE FREEDOM OF A KING.

In the chorus of a recent popular song, America is characterized as "the land where every man's a king." It is a thought familiar enough, presenting in a single word the contrast between the governed masses of Europe and the self-government which is the theory of America, and it is particularly appropriate to the week that culminates in Independence Day. It speaks of dignity, but also of responsibility, and it is upon this latter side that it is time to put the emphasis for those Americans especially who, being free, are kings and priests to God through Jesus Christ.

The king is free, indeed, but he must inevitably be judged by the law of liberty. Freedom can never be like an open ocean upon which the captain steers east or west as the fancy of the moment leads him. It is an open sea, but the captain remembers his responsibility and uses his liberty to bring the ship to her destined port in safety. Christian Americans are kings, but they are self-limited by the appropriate restrictions of a king.

Idleness is not for kings. Civic life is a part of work for God. Social obligations are a part of duty which we owe to Christ. He who, on the side of social and political action, evades responsibility, has abdicated a primary and essential part of his royalty. It is this evasion, indeed, which makes the problems of our political life so hard to solve. The real trouble is above and not below, and the word of the prophet is fulfilled in our States and cities every day: "Thine own wickedness shall correct thee and thy backslidings shall reprove thee. Know, therefore, and see, that it is an evil thing and a bitter that thou hast forsaken the Lord thy God, and that my fear is not in thee, saith the Lord of Hosts."

Nor can a king afford to strike hands with evil. He is not free to be a partner in the gains of sin. Wages of iniquity defile his soul. Many a man in the interests of business and political advancement has forfeited his freedom. He dare not speak his mind or follow his convictions. He is in league with evil, and he knows that evil men will rise up and laugh at him if he professes love of good. He has committed sin and is become the slave of sin, and nothing can make a free man of him but confession and repentance. He is like King Charles II. of England, who did not dare to move a hand in European politics because he was subsidized by France.

Another limitation self-imposed upon the freedom of a king is that of purpose. True lives move ever toward a chosen end. He who drifts becomes a slave of the current. "He that wavereth is like a wave of the sea, driven of the wind and tossed." For the Christian the true end of life can only be the purpose of his Lord. To witness God to men, to serve his fellows, to live in that communion with the Father which makes the world a place of happiness as well as prayer, to finish the work, whatever it may be, which he has given us to do, these are the purposes of the kingly life. In activity, in righteousness, in service, and in these alone, the king is free.

COLORADO'S APPEAL AND CLAIM.

We urge our readers not to pass by with a hasty or perfunctory reading the statement on page 24 of this issue regarding Colorado College. When men personally known to many of us and highly prized both for their intellectual worth and their sterling manhood are straining every nerve to reach an important goal, the least we can do is to give respectful attention to their plea. William F. Slocum, Jr., would grace the presidential chair of any institution in the land, and associated with him in the staff of teachers are men and women who represent all that is best in Eastern rearing and culture and in general equipment for their special duties. From personal inspection of the college we can bear witness to its indispensable value as respects the State, the denomination and the dominance of Christianity in the Rocky Mountain belt. The map which we present this week shows over what a vast field it, and it alone, of Congregational colleges sends forth its streams of influence.

The college is today passing through an intense moment in its history. Other institutions which are struggling to build up endowments have important tasks before them, but for Colorado College the present holds the issues literally of life or death. It is not a question of the securing of funds with which to carry on an enlarged work; it is the question whether the work already begun shall go on as it is or whether it shall stop.

Colorado has won a place in the first rank of institutions of higher learning in the West; its former students are carrying off honors in the graduate and undergraduate departments of our best universities. Shall it continue to advance, and more and more take possession of the place which is open to it, or shall its teaching force be cut down? Shall its progress be abruptly turned into decadence? Shall it sink to a place among second-grade colleges and see other institutions take possession of its rightful field?

It is often said that Colorado is wealthy enough to support its own institutions. But it must be remembered that only a very small part of the wealth of the Rocky Mountains is in the hands of Christian people, that in Colorado Christian philanthropic capitalists are few and far between, that not many of its wealthy men have as yet learned the joy of giving. The college has a right to appeal to Eastern benevolence. It is every year receiving the sons and daughters of Eastern parents and sending them back to their homes strengthened in body, mind and spirit. It is doing a work for them that cannot be done elsewhere in the land. If, again, it be argued from the Eastern standpoint that the State by its espousal of political and financial heresies forfeits its claim to outside benevolence, the reply is that there is all the more need of an institution that will counteract dangerous tendencies by standing for those safe and lofty principles which alone can save a State or a nation.

The East must be patient and generous a little longer. Nothing can aid more rapidly in the conversion of Colorado's wealthy men into Christian philanthropists than the work of such an institution as Colorado College. Dr. Pearsons has done his part toward making its future glorious. Are there not many who will be glad to have a share in the splendid undertaking?

COLLEGE HOPES AND WORLD EXPERIENCES.

The college processes of training and instruction are at an end, the farewells have been spoken, the years of quiet study and gay experience are closed and the life of the world opens for the graduates. Are the ideals which have been formed by classroom and campus to be confirmed or overturned in the struggles and trials that await these thousands of young men and women, whose diplomas are but a few days old and whose hopes of success are as yet unproved?

It is wise to remember that the tests of ability in college life are not final or complete. Those who have won honors in the classroom and are conspicuous in the social and scholarly awards of the Commencement week sometimes fall rapidly behind in the harder competition of the open world, and those of whom their teachers and their classmates never thought as leaders forge rapidly ahead in new conditions. It is no time, therefore, for relaxed effort or for discouragement. Life's first skirmish is over, but the real battle is already on, and he will count for most who presses toward the front with well-considered use of every weapon at command. College honors count for little in the battle of life. College failures, on the other hand, need not hamper one. Even sins and follies of the undergraduate days may be atoned for by earnest striving. It is a time for courage and endeavor.

But courage must be linked with faith to be ready for its best attainment. If we smile at the rose-tinted glasses through which the new alumnus or alumna views the world, we ought to grieve when there comes out of college halls a man or woman with a soul gray-tinged with pessimistic doubt. Youth should be dowered with courage, cheered by faith and glorified by hope. If there are disappointments, disillusions, lines about the brow and eyes, gray hairs to be encountered and experienced in the passing years—these are but a little price to pay for the power of an established character. Whether our young men and maidens shall fill a large place in the world's eye matters little. Few are prominent in the attention of any one generation, but the victory that overcomes, and in overcoming helps the world, is within the reach of all.

AMERICANISM TRIUMPHANT IN CANADA.

For eighteen years the Conservative party has dominated the affairs of the Dominion of Canada, and the record of its career is not one that can lead a Tory partisan, a Canadian citizen or a denizen of the British Empire to indulge in much boasting. Neither the people, the industries, the commerce, the literature nor the morals of the people have prospered as they should have done, and the Dominion today is debt-ridden, hampered in its development and corrupt in its politics because of the statecraft of Sir John McDonald and his successors. Last week, however, the people arose in their might, and in a contest unrivaled in the Dominion's history for its vigor and bitterness transformed the Dominion Parliament from one with a large Conservative majority into one that will have a Liberal majority of not far from twenty-two over both the Conservative and Independent members. Quebec, that sent thirty Conservatives in 1891, elects only fifteen this year; Nova Scotia, that sent sixteen Conservatives in 1891, elects only nine this year; and Ontario now sends seven Independents to fill seats occupied by Conservatives in the last Parliament. This overwhelming defeat of Sir Charles Tupper and his allies among the hierarchy of the Roman Catholic Church will place in power as premier the eminent citizen of Quebec, Hon. Wilfrid Laurier, who, since the retirement of Hon. Edward Blake, has been the acknowledged leader of the Liberal party. Mr. Laurier is a Roman Catholic, but one who does his own thinking on political questions and refuses to be dictated to by the hierarchy. He believes in a tariff for Canada such as is necessary to procure adequate revenue, but he does not believe in protection for protection's sake, and his advent to power with a strong working majority is generally conceded to herald the dawning of a day of freer trade between the United States and Canada, and one of far more amicable relations between the two governments. In England it is interpreted as meaning this, and also as putting an end, for a time, at least, to Mr. Chamberlain's scheme for closer trade relations between Great Britain and Canada.

The vote in the Northwest Territories, Manitoba and Ontario, is not so much responsible for the result as might have been expected. It is due, rather, to an overturning, of which that in the Province of Quebec is typical, where the Roman Catholic electors deliberately scorned the mandement of the Roman Catholic priests, refused to vote for Conservative candidates pledged to grant remedial legislation in Manitoba, and voted for one of their own race who had frankly said throughout the campaign that he denied the authority of the bishops to determine political questions, and that if made premier he would use straightforward argument and conciliation rather than subterfuge, force and threats in dealing with the vexed Manitoba school problem. That so many of the Roman Catholic electors placed political convictions above religious prejudice and deliberately disobeyed their priests is an omen of better days in Canada, too often in the past the arena where sectarian feuds have been fought out at the polls, and the people made the pawns with which the ecclesiastics have won games of profit to themselves. So many French Canadians have come in touch with our New England life, either through visits, labor in our factories or reading our newspapers, that they have come to have a sense of independence that their fathers knew nothing of, and the fruits of this contact with our political institutions and distinctive atmosphere are beginning to ripen and be plucked.

Mr. Puddefoot, in a letter to the New York Tribune, tells of his experiences among Western advocates of free silver, and concludes his letter with the following characteristic observation:

While it would be impossible to train the great majority of men into able financiers, it ought to be an easy matter to show them that when the ownership of silver can take less than $10 worth of that metal to the mint and bring away $18 in coin, the people who do not own the silver must make good the difference; and that to put on the coins "In God we trust" for the balance is tempting Providence, and will most surely lead to disappointment.

THE DUTY AND USES OF REST.

Most of us look upon rest, especially in the vacation which we are apt to take at this season of the year, as a reward or recompense, and in a sense this is correct. It often is spoken of also as a duty, but not always, probably, with a complete appreciation of it as such. To take a rest is regarded as a duty but the employment of it is considered less from the point of view of duty, and sometimes we are tempted to act as if our vacation were from obligations as really as from labors.

It is indeed a duty to rest when weary. The position of those—and there are such—who insist that work should be incessant because God forbids idleness may be due to conscientiousness, but it is mistaken, not to add morbid. Most of us, however, probably are more open to a different temptation. All should understand that rest is not only wise but is even necessary to one who leads a busy life, and that sheer idleness, when it has been honestly earned and is not too greatly prolonged or misspent in any way, possesses large recuperative and helpful power. It is true that a change of work is refreshing, but the teacher, the minister, the banker, the mechanic, or the housewife who is content to merely eat, sleep, breathe and be amused during vacation probably resumes the accustomed tasks with the best power of future usefulness. Yet each must decide for himself.

No time of rest is spent to best advantage, however, which is not made to serve the highest part of our nature. If we are not studying books we can observe men and women and learn from them. If we cease temporarily from making money we may find in our leisure a superior opportunity for making character, for exerting a Christian influence, for learning how unaccustomed temptations assail and are to be conquered, and how forms of virtue hitherto uncalled for specially are to be appreciated and cultivated. And he who fails in vacation to set apart some time more than is usual with him for meditation and prayer and communion with Christ fails of one of its sweetest and most rewarding privileges.

Moreover, if you are one of those whom toil presses hard and for whom there is no respite, take courage. Find your rest and refreshment in renewed study of your blessings, and be sure that Christ will not forget you, but will impart to you his comfort and his peace.

CURRENT HISTORY.

The Future Destiny of the United States.

Poets and students of history seem to be uniting in holding up before the British and the American peoples the duty they owe to each other in order that they may perform their nobler duty to mankind. Thus Prof. George B. Adams of Yale, in the July Atlantic, shows why the United States must assume, with Great Britain, far wider and more world embracing responsibilities concerning foreign affairs than our fathers ever dreamed of our assuming, and in the July Century T. B. Aldrich, the poet that Harvard has just honored by giving the degree of Master of Arts, says:

Restless the Northern Bear amid his snows
Crouched by the Neva; menacing is France,
That sees the shadow of the Uhlan's lance
On her clipt borders; struggling in the throes
Of wanton war lies Spain, and deathward goes.
And thou, O England, how the time's mischance
Hath fettered thee, that with averted glance
Thou standest, marble to Armenia's woes!
If 'twas thy haughty Daughter of the West
That stayed thy hand, a word had driven away
Her sudden ire, and brought her to thy breast!
Thy blood makes quick her pulses, and some day,
Not now, yet some day, at thy soft behest
She at thy side shall hold the world at bay.

A Deplorable Leakage.

The recent deaths of ex-Secretary of the Treasury Bristow and Hon. Lyman Trumbull call attention to the fact that they were eminent representatives of a class of men once prominent in public life, but who left it because unappreciated and undeservedly thrust out. Ex-Senator Trumbull, for instance, was a descendant of the Trumbulls of Connecticut and the Mathers of Massachusetts, a judge on the Illinois Supreme Bench for six years, a United States senator from 1855 to 1866, doing more, it is said by competent authorities, to shape the legislation of the country during the war and reconstruction period than any other man, and yet because he followed the dictates of his conscience, saw clearer than many of his associates and voted for the acquittal of President Andrew Johnson, he was termed a traitor to his party, and so ostracized that he left it and public life as well, never, however, losing the respect of his neighbors and professional associates, who realized his rare mental and moral power.

Ex-Secretary of the Treasury Bristow, after the Independent Republicans had failed to win for him—and the principles he represented—a victory in the Republican National Convention of 1876, also ceased to serve the public, and like ex-Senator Trumbull retired to the practice of a profession which proved lucrative. Somehow our American system of representation should be altered so as to make it possible for men of such character and ability to find constituents who would support them in independent thought and action. It is interesting to note that Mr. Trumbull in his later days was as indifferent to opprobrium, and as faithful to what he believed to be right as he was when in the Senate. Hence he placed his talents at the disposal of Mr. Debs, and argued in his behalf against the decrees of Federal Courts.

Domestic Politics.

Mr. McKinley, in speeches made to delegations of Republicans visiting him at his home in Canton, has emphasized that plank in the Republican platform which reaffirms devotion to protection, but he also has not failed to remark that he believes in a dollar "good for a dollar not only at home but in every mart and market place in the world." The large gathering of Ohio women last week in Canton to pay their respects to Mr. McKinley, his mother and his wife, was notable for the declaration by the spokeswoman that those whom she represented had no fear "that under the coming administration hearth fires would burn dimmer or counting-rooms be closed," and that, should Mr. McKinley be called to preside over the destinies of the nation, there would be a man at the helm "of character so pure and a reputation so untarnished" that any mother might feel proud to have her son imitating his example. Mr. Hanna, who is to be the chairman of the Republican campaign committee, has selected some of those who are to be his chief assistants, and outlined a course of action which promises to introduce some novel features into the campaign. Whether the committee's headquarters will be transferred from New York to the Interior, in which section it is conceded by all that the battle is to be waged most fiercely, has not been settled yet. The anti-Platt Republicans of New York State are preparing to create a machine which will surpass that of Mr. Platt in effectiveness and win, if possible, from Mr. Hanna and Mr. McKinley the recognition of the Administration should Mr. McKinley be elected.

Of the Democratic State conventions held last week Wisconsin's was the only one which indorsed the gold standard and the Administration. Illinois, Ohio, Indiana, North Carolina and Georgia send delegates instructed to support the free coinage of silver, and Texas sends rival delegations of which the free silver faction is sure to be recognized. The Democrats of New York State, led by Mr. William C. Whitney and Senator Hill, brought forth a platform favoring international bimetallism, but insisting upon the maintenance of the gold standard by the United States until the cooperation of other nations can be secured. Calculated by its framers to furnish the via media along which all Democrats may walk to certain victory, its reception by the two wings of the Democracy has demonstrated conclusively that the day of compromise has passed. The virulence of the attacks upon Mr. Cleveland by some of the speakers at the Illinois, Indiana and Ohio conventions indicates how far apart the Administration and the rank and file of the party in the West are, and these attacks, together with the declarations of the platforms of those States favoring policies that hitherto have been indorsed only by Populists, would seem to make it certain that conservative, gold standard Democrats of the East, and the men in the South and West like Senator Tillman of South Carolina and Governor Altgeld of Illinois cannot abide together much longer in the same party.

Estimates of the comparative strength of gold and silver in the approaching convention in Chicago vary somewhat, but it seems now as if the relative strength of the two factions at the beginning of the convention would be not far from 586 for silver and 342 for gold, a majority in favor of silver large enough, if the present temper of the leaders of that faction holds, to formulate a free silver plank in the platform if not to name a candidate in sympathy with the platform. Mr. Whitney, in an interview as late as the 27th, practically conceded that the gold standard minority had no chance of preventing a declaration in favor of free silver. Senator Gorman of Maryland, who is astute if nothing else, will not attend the convention, conceding that it is useless for the East to attempt to shape the platform or name the candidate. Strong delegations of Democrats from Massachusetts, New York, Illinois and Maryland and the commercial centers of the South will go to Chicago intent upon saving the party from what they believe to be disruption and overwhelming defeat and they will carry with them the petitions of eminent men who, either for many years or during recent years, have been identified with the party and contributors to its treasury. An impressive document, put forth by the German American League, pledging its support to the party favoring the gold standard, will also await the party leaders at Chicago and indicate to them how the Germans of the country will vote. The Administration, of course, is throwing all of its influence in favor of a declaration against free silver, but it labors under the disadvantage of knowing that the more it does to make known its desires the more fuel it adds to the fires of hatred which consume the souls of demagogues like Mr. Tillman and Mr. Altgeld and their rampant followers.

The British Ministry's Ups and Downs.

The withdrawal of the Education Bill must be most humiliating to Mr. Balfour, and plague those adherents of the Roman Catholic and Anglican folds who hoped that the government with its tremendous majority could ram the bill through Parliament, and thus redeem the pledges made when the appeal was last made to the electors. But dissensions within the ranks of the majority, the cross fire of hostile amendments which came from Conservatives and Liberal Unionists as well as Liberals, proved too much for Sir John Gorst, who introduced the bill, and Mr. Balfour, the responsible leader in the Commons, and rather than face prolonged and destructive debate and an adverse vote, the bill was withdrawn soon after debate began in the committee stage. We can imagine the delight of such men as Dr. John Clifford and Dr. Guinness Rogers, who opposed it because it threatened to revolutionize the educational system of England and intensify the sectarian animosities all too intense there now. A call to arms already had gone forth, summoning the Dissenters of England to grapple with the forces of ecclesiasticism, and it needed but the enactment of the Gorst Education Bill to have stirred up such a blaze of feeling in England as it has not seen in many a day. Now, however, the enemy has retired to realign its forces, and a reaction is setting in, in and out of Parliament, which may topple over the ministry on any one of several of the many items which still burden its parliamentary program.

The arrest by Venezuelan officials of a surveyor employed by British Guiana in surveying on territory which is in dispute between the two Powers threatened for a time last week to inflame the passions of the British public and lead to acts which might have complicated or undone all negotiations between the United States and Great Britain, but the British Foreign Office, fortunately, ignored the clamor of the more belligerent of the British journals, referred the matter to the United States for its friendly offices, and the latter in turn so impressed upon Venezuela the necessity of acting wisely and pacifically that the surveyor was released and all chance for misunderstanding was removed. If this amicable settlement is typical of the temper and method that are to rule in the future, it must be conceded that a marked change for the better has come since last December, when Lord Salisbury and Mr. Olney were indulging in their bluffing and boasting.

The Future of South Africa.

Southerners will find considerable satisfaction in Hon. James Bryce's statements in the July Century, concerning the relations between the whites and blacks of South Africa. All of the latter, he says, whether educated or savage, Christian or heathen, African or Indian, are treated by the whites as divided from themselves by a wide and impassable gulf. This situation Mr. Bryce attributes to the old feeling of contempt for slaves inherited and held by a generation of whites that has never known slavery as an actual system, partly to physical aversion, and partly to an incompatibility of character and temper. But it will be noted that Mr. Bryce finds this hostile attitude just where we find it most pronounced in this country, viz., strongest in those "rude and uncultivated whites who plume themselves all the more upon their color because they have little else to plume themselves upon." He predicts that, speaking broadly, South Africa will always be a black man's country, and that the future peace and prosperity of the land will largely depend upon "the wisdom and temper with which the higher race treats the backward one, and leads it onward and upward."

If Great Britain has made an arrangement with Portugal, as is reported, by which British troops may land on Portuguese soil and march through to Matabeleland, then an important strategic move against all of Britain's enemies, including the Transvaal, has been effected. President Kruger's recent demand that Sir Cecil Rhodes be prosecuted by the British Government has at least had this effect, viz., to force Mr. Chamberlain to compel the directors of the British South Africa Company to accept the resignations of Mr. Rhodes and Mr. Alfred Beit. Of course this is only a nominal victory for the cause of decency and honor, for Mr. Rhodes will have quite as much to say in the future as in the past about the company's affairs, but even a nominal victory is well for Britain's honor.

Turkey Passes Description.

Turks and Armenians have fought again at Van, and the estimates of the number of Armenians killed ranges from 400 to 1,500. The charges against Rev. George R. Knapp, which Turkey has at last been forced to declare, are such as make all who know him smile in derision. The governor of Bitlis says Mr. Knapp gave the signal for an assault by Moslems upon the Armenians; that he paid men to murder an Armenian (he must mean a Turk); and that he aided in carrying off a Moslem girl. Mr. Knapp's family are now with him in Constantinople, where he is eagerly awaiting the opportunity to disprove these trumped up charges. Miss Barton reports that her assistants have done most remarkable work in suppressing epidemics of contagious diseases in towns where their aid was most needed; that the Turk is aiding in every way the humane efforts of herself and helpers; and that large sums should be forthcoming promptly if the work which needs to be done in succoring the needy and re establishing industries and agriculture is to be accomplished. The situation in Crete has not changed much. Possibly the appointment of a governor of the Greek faith, Georgi Pacha Bereovitch, Prince of Samos, may alleviate the situation somewhat. Mr. Gladstone continues to free his mind respecting the Turk and the complicity of Great Britain, for in writing to the London Chronicle he said last week:

> Nobody uses language half strong enough against the sultan and his agents. To describe their guilt is beyond all bounds, and the language ought to go beyond all bounds. My choice is between far out-Heroding everybody and absolute silence; for my language abstractedly might plausibly be ascribed to temper, whereas it would be perfectly cold-blooded. I am silent only for fear of doing harm. The European mind wants plausible excuses to cover its disgrace. I do not wish to furnish them.

NOTES.

Hawaii has just adopted an income tax.

A cave-in and explosion in a Pittston, Pa., coal mine last Sunday morning buried nearly 100 miners.

Eighteen thousand people lined the banks of the Hudson near Poughkeepsie, June 26, and witnessed a splendid rowing contest between the crews of Cornell, Harvard, Pennsylvania and Columbia Universities, the Cornell crew winning and establishing a new record.

The Greater New York Commission met last week, defeated the plan of the Brooklyn members to commit the commission to indorsement of the non-centralized, borough system of administration and assigned to certain individuals the prosecution of necessary, detailed inquiries at home and abroad concerning methods of municipal government. Both ex-Judge Dillon and President Low of Columbia University are planning to spend the summer in Europe in quest of information, which will, in turn, become the property of the commission.

IN BRIEF.

It is seldom that even in this, the oldest, part of the country a church arrives at the advanced age of 250 years. The celebration, therefore, this week of its quarter-millennial by the church in Saybrook arouses, naturally, more than a local interest. There are additional reasons for marking the occasion in view of the relation of this church to Yale College and to that honored symbol of our faith known as the Saybrook Platform. A son of that town, himself a descendant of its founders and today an honored Congregational pastor, contributes to this issue a pleasing sketch of the circumstances out of which this church grew. The pictures on our cover page reveal a typical New England structure and a street like many another which can be found up and down our New England country. The entire sisterhood of Congregational churches extends its greeting to the Saybrook church which is passing through such an eventful week. The lesson of the important place which rural churches held and continue to hold in the life of the community ought to be impressed upon us all afresh, particularly at this season, when so many dwellers in cities are returning to the country.

Boston provides baby carriages for visitors to Franklin Park who need them. Civic maternalism!

What is a debt upon a missionary society? "An incubus upon faith, a strait-jacket upon love and a chain upon the pinions of hope," says The Christian Advocate.

"It is not Dartmouth alone which has been invaded by the daughters this year for the first time. Among the diplomas granted at Yale in the graduate departments eight were to women.

The dimensions of Sunday pleasure seeking traffic may be suggested by the statement, semi-official, that the surface railroads of the city of Brooklyn, N. Y., on June 21, collected fares from 525,000 passengers.

Just as the phonograph and kinetoscope have been used by the vicious to tempt and degrade those who float up and down the streets of our great cities, so the bicycle is becoming the obedient, unmoral ally of the criminal in fleeing from the scene of his misdeeds.

President Adams of the University of Wisconsin, when he came last week to give the secret of President Angell's marked success at the University of Michigan, found it largely in the fact that first-class men and up-to-date apparatus had been considered by him more important than elegant piles of brick and stone.

There were 378 Unitarian churches in Great Britain in 1888; there are only 354 now. Scotland had seven Unitarian churches in 1850, and it has eight now. And yet Unitarians across the water, when they get together, just as their brethren here do, felicitate themselves that they are a church that is satisfying the public need as no other church can.

The king of France marched his army up a hill and then down again. Dr. Lunn flung himself out of the Wesleyan fold, and Bishop Vincent of the Methodist Episcopal Church, happening to be in Europe at the time, welcomed Dr. Lunn into the Methodist Episcopal fold. Now Dr. Lunn has resigned from the Methodist Episcopal Church and returned to his first love.

A collision at midnight so jostled two Irishmen occupying a section of a railway car that when they emerged in deshabille Pat said, "Mike, are you hurted?" "No," said Mike, who had entered his trousers so that they were in an abnormal relative position, "I am not hurted, Pat, but I am fatally twisted." The same remark might be applied to the condition of the Democratic party today.

The call of Rev. F. W. Baldwin, D. D., of East Orange, N. J., to the chair of history and economics just established at Bates College is another evidence that the partition between Free Baptists and Congregationalists is decidedly thin. If his own church permits him to accept this summons of his alma mater, his influence we are sure will promote still further friendly relations between the denominations.

After repeated efforts to induce the General Assembly and the presbyteries to take up the subject of vacant churches and ministerial supply for the whole Presbyterian Church, a bureau intended to serve as an intermediary between churches and ministers has been established by the enterprise of the Presbyterian Journal of Philadelphia on the business basis of fees for information and presentation of name and credentials. This is quite an enlargement of the scope of the denominational newspaper.

At this season we always have occasion to notice what the sons and daughters of ministers are doing in the field of scholarship. The oldest son of Rev. G. M. Boynton, D. D., secretary of the C. S. S. and P. S., has just won the Rotch architectural scholarship given by the architects of Boston and insuring him two years of travel and study abroad. It is a much coveted honor and one which is not obtained without arduous and persistent effort. A son of Rev. Dr. E. A. Reed of Holyoke has been awarded the Douglass scholarship at Yale, which secures for him a term of study abroad, his specialty being English literature. In the long run we are ready to match ministers' children against the descendants of any other class of professional or business men.

Rev. George A. Gordon, D. D., has taken his European trip earlier than usual this year in order to comply with the request of Mansfield College that he lecture there before the academic year came to its close. He was on the ground only a fortnight, but was hard at work all the time preaching, lecturing and holding conferences with the students. In what high esteem the pastor of the Old South Church is held in Oxford this new demand for his services shows. He comes back more thoroughly convinced than ever of the great work which Dr. Fairbairn and his associates are doing at Mansfield College. He finds, too, a growing respect for the institution among leaders of the Establishment. It could hardly be otherwise, unless brilliancy and thoroughness of intellectual equipment counted for nothing in their eyes.

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM NEW YORK.

The People's Lectures.

For eight years the Board of Education's course of free lectures to the people has been growing in favor, and most deservedly so. The subjects have been wisely chosen so as to attract by their variety and to impart thorough instruction on matters of practical usefulness. History (American specially), social science, health, literature, art, travel, politics are among the themes discoursed upon by experts in the several studies, men qualified not only by familiarity each with his subject, but by the rare gift so to set his knowledge forth as to hold the attention and meet the wants of the hearers. Thirty different places for the lectures in as many sections of the city were opened this year, nearly twice as many as last year; over 1,000 lectures were given, a large majority of them illustrated by stereopticon or experiments; nearly 393,000 people, mostly adults and many of them women, were listeners to the course, running from the last of October to the first of April. The cost has been small, the schoolhouses, Cooper Union, the Natural History Museum, Hebrew Institute and other similar places being freely utilized for the purpose. The rapid growth of interest warrants the planning for still greater enlargement next autumn.

Their Bodies Cared for, Also.

Nor are the physical wants of "the people" left uncared for. The "summer corps" of fifty physicians has been already appointed—three fifths of them having had previous experience of the work—to care for the poor sick in the city's more crowded tenements at the public charge. These have a semi-police authority, empowering them to compel the self neglecting, mostly foreign, herds to so far comply with the health laws as not to needlessly endanger the lives of their neighbors. The new interest in securing more breathing spaces for the poorer classes has at length succeeded in opening a park really worth having—an entire square—at Corlear's Hook on the East Side, to which the crowds can resort for fresh air from the river, and where evening concerts are to be given weekly at the city's cost. Another (smaller) park is slowly being made ready at Mulberry Bend, the old Five Points neighborhood. A new impulse has been given to the Health Board's movement for demolishing many of the filthy, unsafe, contagion breeding rear tenements with which the greed of landlords has covered the few feet where else the thronging tenement house children might catch a breath of air—such as it is. Then, too, the public floating baths in both rivers, fifteen of them, are now getting into place for the summer. In these structures last season 3,100,000 baths were enjoyed, free of cost, by men and boys, and 1,800,000 by women and girls.

Commencement Time.

Columbia and New York Universities, the City College, normal schools and all the higher schools and institutes of the metropolitan district are pouring out an unusual number of graduates this season, and, if reports are true, of an unusually high grade of scholarship. Five young women received their diplomas from the medical college and hospital for women, making them full fledged M. D's. Not the most showy, but among the most important and useful classes of graduates are those from the city and Brooklyn training schools. These are yearly sending out classes of both boys and girls, well trained not only in the manual branches of many useful trades, but in the science and book learning pertaining thereto. The exhibitions closing the year's courses have shown work by the pupils of which the most expert mechanic might be proud. Let this work go on and grow as it should, and a powerful blow—it may be made a deathblow—is struck at that worse than Russian despotism which forbids "a free and independent American citizen" to teach his son the honest, useful industry by which the father has thrived, and the practice of which enters so largely into the basis of our country's prosperity and freedom. Our public schools close with June. That their work is not yet done has been shown by a fearful panic last week—not in Central Africa, but in one of our East Side school playgrounds—caused by an alleged appearance of the devil among them, bent on taking them with him to the nether world. Only prompt and effective action of the teachers and the police prevented serious injuries if not loss of life.

Personals.

Dr. and Mrs. Lyman Abbott, with a son and daughter, sailed for England on the Monarch, June 27. The doctor is to attend the Evangelical Alliance jubilee meetings in London, as are the president, Mr. William E. Dodge, Drs. John Hall and G. U. Wenner of this city, with many other delegates, and Dr. Josiah Strong, the secretary, who sailed a week ago. The True Unity of the Church is to be their theme.

Dr. George F. Pentecost of London will supply Dr. Hall's pulpit during a part of his vacation. Dr. A. T. Pierson will again render like service for the Fourth Avenue Church (Dr. Davies's, formerly Dr. Howard Crosby's). Dr. Virgin will spend his summer, as usual, in Chelmsford, his pulpit to be supplied by Drs. Jubb of Fall River and H. A. Stimson.

Among recent preachers in the Broadway Tabernacle pulpit have been Drs. Burnham of St. Louis, Andrews of Union College, Griffis of Ithaca, Genung of Amherst, Phillips of Rutland, Thomas of Brookline and Boynton of Detroit.

A Christian's Death.

The murder of Mr. George H. Wyckoff, president of the Bank of New Amsterdam, has excited such unusual interest among business men here and, indeed, with all classes as to encourage the hope that the sacrifice of this noble life may leave behind a profitable lesson. Suddenly surprised at his desk by a demand for money, a loaded pistol meanwhile pointed at his breast, he did his best to disarm the wretch and protect the property in his charge, but in a moment he was fatally wounded and his assailant had turned the weapon with like result against his own life. As the ambulance was bearing both of these dying men to the hospital, the victim turned to his murderer with these Christlike words: "Why did you do this? I never injured you. May God forgive you as I do." And when the surgeons came to see what could be done to save this precious life, a like Christian spirit was shown in his request: "Do me this favor. He is a younger man than I and has the better chance. Treat him first." It was not given to surgical skill to save either life, but what a legacy have his stricken widow and children, the Montclair church (Dr. Bradford's) and his fellow-guests in "The Chelsea" apartment house, his winter home, where this quiet, consistent Christian was warmly esteemed, in the lifelong memory of this lovely Christian departure from earth to meet his Lord, who, by wicked hands, was crucified and slain.

HUNTINGTON.

FROM THE INTERIOR.

President Angell's Anniversary.

Chicago is as much interested as any city in the land in the honors paid the president of the University of Michigan. Here he has always been a welcome visitor, and with his addresses has always done good service for the cause he has been invited to help forward. It is a great blessing when a university like that at Ann Arbor can be under the direction of a man like President Angell for a quarter of a century. Nor is the advantage wholly on the side of the institution. The man has an opportunity to carry out his plans, to test his theories, to put himself into successive classes of students, and thus create a constituency for himself outside of college authorities on which he can rely with the certainty that he will neither be misunderstood nor misrepresented by it. It is not surprising that the exercises this week at Ann Arbor were so largely occupied with reminiscences of the service which President Angell has rendered the university, or that distinguished educators from all over the country should have had part in them. The Chicago graduates of the institution and their friends unite in the good wishes which others have been permitted to express for the president, and, thoroughly appreciating the rare ability he has shown as head of the university, trust that for many years yet he may be found in the position he now fills. The total number of candidates for degrees in all the departments of the university this year was 745.

Picnics.

In this era of picnics almost every church here has an interest. Last Saturday the Sunday school of the First Church went to Lake Bluff, the spot which our Methodist brethren have rendered so charming, and on Saturday of the present week, that is today, the school of the Union Park Church is enjoying the cool breezes, pleasant paths and attractive beaches of this famous resort. But picnics mean less to some children than to others. Tuesday a long train of cars filled with the children of the poor went out into the country for a day under the care of the Salvation Army. There was no discounting the happiness of the young urchins. They were, in fact, too happy for the mental peace of those who had them in charge, for when it was time to return to the city a good many of the children could not be found. It was afterwards discovered that in the fondness they that day developed for the country they had decided to hide away in the bushes and in the grass till the train should leave. Then they would in some way secure supper, pass the night under the stars and in the morning begin their lives as farmers. The anxiety of Salvation Army captains was not abated till by good luck they succeeded in getting all the children of their charge on the train and landing them safely in Chicago, thankful that they were only an hour late in reaching their homes. Thursday another great picnic of waifs and their friends was held in Washington Park under the auspices of the Volunteers, General Fielding in command. This picnic has for many years been managed by Mr. Daniels of the Waifs' Mission. The mayor issued a proclamation calling upon citizens for contributions to make the day a pleasant one, and stating the conditions under which the picnic was to be held. It need hardly be added that the enjoyment of the thousands who took part in it cannot be described. The Illinois Central, as usual, transported the children free of expense.

Suits for Blacklisting.

Between thirty and forty suits have been brought against the railroads entering Chicago for preventing men from obtaining work on account of the part they took in the strike of 1894. It is said that there are as many as 500 names on the list. Some of the roads claim that they have only refused to employ such of their own men as were engaged in the strike, and that they have done nothing to prevent their employment elsewhere, although it is not generally denied that they have refused to commend men who left them at the command of Mr. Debs. The suits bid fair to attract a great deal of attention, for the question to be settled is whether railway managers are obliged to give clearance papers or recommendations to men whom they will not themselves employ, or for whom they have no work, when they know that these men not only refused to work during the riots of 1894, but actually helped destroy railroad property. There seems to be little doubt that there was and is some sort of an understanding between the railway managers, and that many men once in good standing are now recognized as persons to whom work is not to be given. Damages are laid at $50,000.

Nominees for Governor.

If many Republicans regret very deeply the nomination of a man with a record like that of John R. Tanner as their standard bearer, a still greater number of Democrats regret the renomination at the convention just held at Peoria of Governor Altgeld. Whatever be the record of Mr. Tanner, it is not so bad as that of the man now in power. Mr. Tanner has the excuse of early training and the views prevailing in the section of the State where he was born and educated, so far as he was educated at all, but for the present governor there is no such excuse. If Mr. Tanner is a political wire puller, he certainly has a dangerous rival in the man who has chosen to run against him. The platform on which the Democratic campaign is to be fought is a silver platform, out and out. In his speech the governor charged the President with violating the Constitution in sending troops to Chicago to quell the riots of the summer of 1894 and during his administration with catering entirely to the wealth of the country without regard to the interests of the poor. Both platform and nominations were determined by the wishes of the governor. At present he is the Democratic boss of the State. It looks now as if the national convention in July would be compelled to declare for the free coinage of silver at the rate of sixteen to one. Still the bolt of gold men in Chicago is serious. It may be that some middle course will be discovered by which both wings of the party may be satisfied. To us in the West it seems as if the present campaign were to be fought out on the currency question rather than that of the tariff, and that the people would decide it in spite of the politicians. No wonder that between the nominations for the governorship such a paper as the Times-Herald declares it will support neither of them, but will "take to the woods." A good many who will yet vote with their party would like to do the same.

Ministers' Meeting.

The paper read to the body last Monday was one of the most valuable to which we have recently listened. It was by Dr. Milton S. Terry of the Garrett Biblical Institute, Evanston, and was on the higher criticism. This was treated as a literary question, and as one belonging to the department of apologetics. Dr. Terry thinks that results about which the critics are substantially agreed should be presented to the people, but that they should be presented in such a way as to strengthen rather than undermine faith in the authority of the Word of God. His own paper was an excellent example of the way in which this may be done. The professor does not think that the fact that Solomon is not the author, as so many have supposed, of the entire book of Proverbs, or of the song which bears his name, or of Ecclesiastes, should diminish confidence in them as containing truth which God wishes us to accept. Our aim must be the discovery of truth. To that we must be loyal. Nor need we have any fear lest in being loyal to truth we find the authority of the Scriptures weakened.

FROM SCOTLAND.

The Gifford Lectureship.

The recent appointment of Prof. A. B. Bruce, D. D., to deliver the next series of the Gifford lectures in Glasgow University has been hailed with general satisfaction. The Gifford foundation is a rich one, but the intentions of the founder, the late Lord Gifford, have been very widely and freely interpreted. In Edinburgh, the other winter, Professor Pfleiderer came across from Germany and made use of his appointment to apply a more or less destructive criticism to historical Christianity. Then, more recently, Mr. Wallace of Oxford came down and treated us to a flippant and discursive survey of religion and philosophy and, indeed, things in general. The spectacle of a Hegelian, with his hands in his pockets, talking at random is not edifying. The lectures of Dr. Bruce, following the dignified and thoughtful course delivered by Dr. Laird, the esteemed principal of our university, will go far to restore public interest in the serious discussion of theological subjects, and to rescue this lectureship from fruitlessness and contempt. The Free Church of Scotland possesses no abler theologian than Dr. Bruce, and no one whose writings are more widely read. It is a well-merited compliment in this case which has been bestowed by the university on the representative of a sister theological college, and we shall look forward this winter to a contribution from Professor Bruce of positive and weighty value and worthy the attention of students of the New Testament and theological science.

The General Assemblies.

Our annual ecclesiastical parliaments concluded their usual ten days' sittings last week in Edinburgh, the picturesque city which never ceases to charm its clerical and other visitors, and which, with good reason, Sir Walter Scott termed "mine own romantic town"! The proceedings in the Established Church Assembly were marked by one or two animated discussions, while those of the Free Church Assembly, presided over by Hon. Rev. William Miller, C. I. E., the able and distinguished head of the Madras Christian College in South India, were characterized by a remarkable degree of cordiality and unanimity. The Church of Scotland, since the political election and reversal of last year, has found itself in a position of greater security, and so long as the present Conservative and Unionist government remains in power the movement known as "church defense" is likely to remain in comparative abeyance. Yet it is significant that Lord Balfour of Burleigh, a member of the British Cabinet and secretary for Scotland, warned the assembly, in which he is an eloquent and vigorous debater, that the Established Church is in greater danger from the apathy of its members than from the attacks of outsiders.

The Free Church feels at present that it is useless to carry on an active disestablishment campaign, but none the less, under the leadership of Principal Rainy, it renewed at this assembly its adherence to the policy of Disestablishment, and its testimony against the injustice to other sections of Presbyterianism and the existing religious bodies in Scotland that is involved in the maintenance of a state church. The Established Church is being attacked at present in newspaper correspondence for two reasons. By a considerable majority it declined at last assembly to sanction the proposed joint hymnal which has been adopted by the United Presbyterian and Free Churches of Scotland, and in which Canada and our colonies have also been interested. It would seem that there is a strong party at work in the Established Church opposed to all efforts at co-operation and union with other churches, and this party looks for light and leading to such men as Dr. John Macleod of Govan and Professor Story. On the other hand, there are many inside the Established Church who are ashamed of this contemptuous rejection of a common praise book, but meanwhile Dr. Marshall Lang and others who share this view must be content to be ruled by the majority.

The other cause of attack is due to the assembly's action in suspending for a year from his pulpit and parish Rev. Alexander Robinson of Kilmar, the author of The Saviour in the Newer Light. In this case also Dr. Lang, who pleaded for a milder sentence, found himself in a minority. Some find fault with the assembly for being too narrow and severe and argue that a broad church party of those in sympathy with the newest criticism should be formed. Be this as it may, there is a general agreement that Mr. Robinson's opinions have been crudely expressed and hastily formed, and that he is hardly the man to stir a church into such commotion or to be leader in a new departure. The movement toward union and incorporation of the Free Church and United Presbyterian Church goes on hopefully.

Our assembly gatherings, although framed on the plain model of John Knox and Presbyterianism, are not wanting in style and ceremony and social attractiveness. The proceedings of the Established Church were graced by the presence of the queen's commissioner and representative, the Earl of Hopetown, who, along with his lady, held a series of receptions in the famed palace of Holyrood. These entertainments are attended by clergymen, leading citizens, military officers and others, and provide a welcome and agreeable variety in the midst of formal and ecclesiastical routine. Dr. Miller, the Free Church moderator, who wore his academic and Indian decorations with marked dignity, invited large numbers to breakfast in the Royal Hotel. In thus doing honor to his friends Principal Miller was rewarded by numerous proofs of honor and recognition to himself. The address sent to the assembly over which he presided, signed by over fifteen hundred educated and influential Hindus and conveying their congratulations and expressions of esteem, was a remarkable tribute to Dr. Miller's work and character and to the success and fruitfulness of educational and Christian missions in India.

The Church and the Press.

A suggestive paragraph in the closing address of Dr. Miller, the moderator of the Free Church Assembly, called attention to the powerful opposition the church in our day has to contend with from numerous organs of the press. The admission was candidly made that it is a serious disadvantage to have a preponderance of the papers that are so largely sold and widely read taking the side of pronounced opponents of the church. This opinion will be strongly shared by all Free Churches. In Scotland the remarks of Principal Miller apply very justly. At the same time, his advice was wise—to make little rather than too much of this form of attack, which is largely based on unfairness and misconception. In the end people will rally to the side which they see is being attacked with prejudiced and poisoned weapons.

It is gratifying to find that the churches can make use of their own organs to diffuse information and to lay hold of the popular mind. The circulation of Life and Work, the parish magazine of the Church of Scotland, is very large. The monthly magazine of the United Presbyterian Church is also largely read, and under the new editorship of Professor Orr is likely to increase in circulation and influence. The Free Church Monthly, under the experienced management of Dr. N. L. Walker, appeals to a great constituency of readers. These and other religious organs must counteract to a great extent the misconceptions scattered by the secular press. But notwithstanding these admissions, the church has still much to do and learn in the art of producing and diffusing bright, fresh, readable and attractive literature.

Our Professors.

We on this side were delighted to find from your columns, quoted in the British Weekly, that Prof. G. A. Smith, by his lectures, has quite captivated his American hearers. We shall look forward with interest to his account of his impressions of America—its universities, its churches, its home missions, its conditions of labor and comfort.

Much sympathy with Professor Drummond, in his prolonged illness, was expressed at the Free Church assembly. The chair of Prof. W. G. Blaikie of the New College, Edinburgh, will be vacated after next session. Dr. Stalker and Dr. Denney are already spoken of as competent and likely candidates.

"Passages of God's Providence at Seabrooke."

By Rev. Edward Mortimer Chapman.

On June 12, 1660, Lion Gardiner sat down in his East Hampton home upon Long Island to write to two old companions in arms some outline of their adventures together in fortifying and settling the mouth of the Connecticut nearly five and twenty years before.

Loving Friends, Robert Chapman and Thomas Hurlburt, my love remembered to you both, these are to inform, that as you desired me when I was with you and Major Mason at Seabrooke, two and a half years ago, to consider and to call to mind the Passages of God's Providence at Seabrooke, in and about the time of the Pequit war, wherein I have now endeavoured to answer your Desires, and have rumaged and found some old papers then written, it was a great help to my memory.

So in a quaint and involved, though always pleasant style, the letter proceeds, giving us an almost unique glimpse of life in one of the earliest fortified posts in New England. The friends came to Boston in 1635, Gardiner fresh from service as an engineer in the Low Countries, and reached Saybrook in the spring of 1636. There, upon a pleasant peninsula about a mile from the river's mouth, they took up the work of fortification begun by a little company under the younger Winthrop in the preceding autumn. The situation was a commanding one. To the east of the knoll on which they built their fort lay the river, while broad coves not only covered their northern and southern flanks but almost encircled them a half-mile to the rear.

As they wrought at their delving and building it was in expectation of distinguished company in the near future, for things were going so ill in England that men like Lord Say and Sele, Lord Brook, Sir Arthur Haselrig, and even Hampden and Cromwell, as some contend, were casting longing looks across the water. So that the fort and its inclosures were laid out with distinct reference to the building of large and goodly houses. But the expectation was not to be fulfilled. Things that had been going ill in England went so much worse that they could not be left. So Haselrig stayed to ride through the great rebellion at the head of his famous "lobster" cuirassiers, Hampden to meet his death at Chalgrove, and Oliver, as all the world knows, to hew out a new England at home instead of sailing over sea to find one. George Fenwick came, however, and with him the Lady Alice Botelar, his wife. But in 1645 she died, and soon after Fenwick returned to become a colonel in the Parliamentary army and governor of Berwick-upon-Tweed.

So the task of rearing a settlement at the river's mouth, despite the Pequots and the Dutch, fell to plain people after all. It was grim work though, and for a year or two the little community was in constant peril. Outside the inclosure of the fort none was safe. Even the soldier beating "samp" at the garden pales found savages stealthily creeping around to cut him off. Butterworth met a miserable fate in the meadow that has perpetuated his name; Tilly was overpowered almost within sight of the fort and put to death with awful tortures; Mitchell, a brother of "Matchless" Mitchell, minister in Cambridge, was captured and burned; while, as though to suggest what was taking place beyond their immediate ken, another, whose name we do not know, "came down drowned to us ashore at our doors with an arrow shot into his eye, through his head."

On a February day in 1637, venturing out to burn some reeds, Gardiner and his little company found themselves so sore beset that he and Robert Chapman, with one or two others, were forced to leave two men dead upon the field, while they covered the slow retreat of their wounded with naked swords, the arrows pelting so viciously upon the leader's stout buff coat meanwhile, that the Indians were loath to believe that he had reached the fort alive. Yet in the midst of all this jeopardy the settlers managed in some way to keep heart of grace, and Gardiner reminds his friends of the "pretty pranks" they played and how they laughed at the success of them. Then sometimes, too, they went "a fowling," as do their sons unto this day.

After these trials were over and it became evident that the colony must make its own way in the world without waiting for much re enforcement from home, the thought of the little community naturally turned to the organization of a church. Hitherto it had been served by chaplains as befitted a military post. First came Mr. Higginson, who stayed through the sorry times of the war and whose service proved "suitable, seasonable and profitable, according to the then present dispensation of Providence," and to him succeeded Mr. Thomas Peters, a brother of the redoubtable Hugh.

Thus it was not until 1646, after Fenwick had returned to England and families had begun to venture themselves beyond the stockades, that organization was finally effected. Then, on a given day, probably in late spring or early summer, the little community gathered in the great hall of the fort and entered into solemn covenant with God and one another. It is almost certain that the famous Hooker of Hartford preached the sermon, after which James Fitch was solemnly ordained to the ministry by the imposition of the hands of the laity. Among the company who gathered there were Lieut. William Bushnell, the ancestor of Horace Bushnell, Thomas Leffingwell, whose single-handed relief of the beleaguered Uncas forms a romantic incident in the settlement's early history, and Robert Chapman, who was to serve the colony in more than fifty sessions of the General Court and in his old age to try conclusions with Sir Edmund Andros. There, too, was the "Widow Thomas Lee," ancestress of President Cleveland, and possibly Deacon Richard Bushnell, who numbered among his descendants Samuel Johnson, president of King's College, and William Samuel Johnson, first president of Columbia College.

In 1660 the young church gave of its best to found the town and church of Norwich, and was sadly depleted by the sacrifice. After a little, however, a new and worthy leader came to it in the person of Thomas Buckingham, ancestor of Connecticut's revered war governor, and it saw better days once more. It was during his pastorate, on Nov. 11, 1701, that seven members of a newly constituted corporate body met in Saybrook and organized the Collegiate School, which has come to be known to all the world as Yale University. From 1702 to 1716 the annual Commencements were regularly held here, but with the Commencement of 1717 the college took up its permanent abode in New Haven, to the great chagrin, not of Saybrook only, but of Hartford and Wethersfield as well, each of whom seems to have coveted it.

Of these yearly celebrations at Saybrook one has a unique interest for all Congregationalists and students of Congregational polity, for at the Commencement in September, 1708, a synod composed of twelve ministers and four lay delegates convened there under instructions from the General Court. After choosing James Noyes of Stonington and Thomas Buckingham of Saybrook moderators, with Stephen Mix and John Woodward scribes, and "after humble addresses to the throne of grace for the divine presence, assistance and blessing," the synod proceeded to the preparation of an ecclesiastical code for the twoscore Congregational churches which it represented. The result of its deliberations was the Saybrook Platform.

Reference is often made to this famous instrument as though it promulgated a creed, new and cased in triple steel—a creed upon which the fictitious Blue Laws might well have been logically consequent. In point of fact, however, the synod made no reference in its result to matters of faith except to recommend the adoption of the confession "owned and assented unto by the elders and messengers assembled at Boston, in New England, May 12, 1680"; i. e., the Savoy Confession, with very slight variations. But in respect to ecclesiastical order it came to definite determinations of its own, which were duly adopted and established for the churches of Connecticut at the next session of the General Court. The objects of this platform have been summed up by Dr. Bacon as follows:

1. The promotion of order and harmony among the ministers and churches.
2. The regular introduction of candidates into the ministry.
3. The establishment of a fixed and defined board of appeal—the county consociation—a council by which such difficulties as the particular churches themselves could not settle might be adjusted.

Since the day when the synod of 1708 adjourned the church in Saybrook has gone its quiet way, planted its colonies in neighboring villages and under the leadership of a long line of godly and scholarly ministers has held forth to each succeeding generation the word of life. It is eminently fitting that its 250 h anniversary should be celebrated this year in the same week with the national birthday. For the New England Church nursed a piety that was social and civic as well as individual. Any estimate of our national history must prove inadequate that fails to take into account the influence of the masterful, ethical sense of the New Englander. And one of the prime factors in the development of that high and efficient quality has ever been the country church, honorable in its traditions, simple in its worship, unwavering in its insistence that every man's life is a plan of God, which, if he be a true man, he must fulfill for the sake of himself, his country and the world.

PILGRIMAGE LETTERS.

II. THE ROYAL WELCOME AT PLYMOUTH.

BY F. J. D.

Max O'Rell, in his good-natured criticism of Americans, affirms that they always use adjectives in the superlative degree. But we of The Congregationalist's Pilgrimage Party may be pardoned for indulging in superlatives when describing our visit to Plymouth, for our reception there so far exceeded anything we ever dreamed of that moderate speech is impossible. We were met in the Millbay Docks by a deputation of nine gentlemen from the Three Towns' Council of Free Churches, assisted by them through the custom house and escorted to the Duke of Cornwall Hotel. From that time onward, during our three days' stay, they and others were untiring in their attentions and we shall bring home a new idea of English hospitality.

This committee came out on a tender, and the most sluggish imagination must have been stirred as hosts and guests met in the little cabin to listen to the address of welcome from Rev. Samuel Vincent. What a contrast was our incoming to the outgoing of the Pilgrims of 1620! The sadness of their farewell and the joyousness of our welcome, together with the marvelous changes in history since the time of James I., were graphically portrayed by Mr. Vincent in his admirable and cordial speech.

The next morning several of this same committee, among them Professor Chapman and Rev. Messrs. Lambert, Rudall, Maxwell and Slater, accompanied us as we explored the odd nooks and corners of this ancient city of about 100,000 inhabitants, under the leadership of the borough librarian, Mr. W. H. K. Wright, who is a Fellow of the Royal Historical Society, an accomplished scholar and an ideal guide. If Americans realized what there is to be seen in Plymouth they would never think of landing at Liverpool or Southampton, now that the American Hamburg steamers touch at this famous port where ships of the admiralty are often at anchor and where Agnes Weston's remarkable work for British sailors may be seen at the Sailors' Rest.

We went first to the George Street Baptist Chapel, occupying the site of the building in which the Pilgrims were entertained before their departure to America, thence to St. Andrew's Church, where Archdeacon Wilkinson graciously explained its numerous interesting features, and by degrees came to the Old Barbican pier, passing through the queerest streets and alleys imaginable. No wonder the residents swarmed out of the low, checker-windowed houses to see what the unusual procession meant. Pins Lane and New Street—the latter being the oldest street in town—were indescribably picturesque, with narrow stone steps, similar to those at Clovelly, leading past the diminutive stone cottages, with overhanging second stories, to higher levels beyond. It added much to our enjoyment to be accompanied by John Barrett, the artist, and to hear his comments on these delightfully quaint bits. Of course we all stood on the slab in front of the custom house, inscribed "Mayflower, 1620," and the dozen lineal descendants of the Puritans in our party must have felt a peculiar thrill as their feet touched the sacred stone. We passed the house in which Catherine of Arragon was entertained by one of the leading merchants in 1501, climbed to the top of the old citadel which commands a superb view of the harbor, and altogether had a most inspiring half-day.

In this connection I wish to voice the sentiment of the entire party in saying with the strongest emphasis that it makes all the difference in the world to be conducted through a foreign city by a scholarly man like Mr. Wright or to go with the conventional guide. Some of his literary illustrations on historical points were delightful. For instance, in one place he read a charming extract from Elihu Burritt's A Walk from London to Land's End and in another a passage from one of Davenant's dramas, both of which were deliciously apropos. Our last excursion in Plymouth was an enjoyable trip to the beautiful Mount Edgcumbe Park, the estate of the Earl of Mount Edgcumbe, special permission having been obtained from his Lordship by the Evangelical Free Church Council. The place is reached by means of a little steamer, and after a two hours' ramble in groves and gardens again we stood upon its deck and exchanged regretful farewells. One of the party in behalf of all thanked our English friends for their innumerable courtesies, all joined in singing "Blest be the tie that binds," and after repeated handshakings we went our separate ways.

But the cream of the Plymouth visit was the reception in Guildhall on Friday evening by the mayor and mayoress, at which about 300 of the leading citizens were present. The interior of this fine municipal building was superbly decorated for the occasion, potted plants, palms, draperies, intertwined flags of the two nations and colored fairy lights being tastefully displayed. In front of the memorial window, which represents the departure of the Pilgrim Fathers, was a raised platform where the mayor, Alderman Bond, stood when he welcomed us most felicitously as "hostages of peace." Fitting replies were made by Rev. Messrs. Dunning, Dexter, Robinson, Soule and Hon. J. A. Lane. The mayor wore his official robe, an imposing scarlet gown trimmed with black velvet and sable and lined with white satin. Over this was a series of massive gold chains, from which depended the municipal seal. Ladies will be interested to know that black satin, Duchess lace and diamonds formed the essential points of Mrs. Bond's dress, but her grace and urbanity far outshone the brilliancy of her jewels.

In order to appreciate the full significance of this function it should be remembered that the office of an English mayor is a purely honorable and not a salaried position, and carries far more distinction with it than a similar position in the average American city. By a happy coincidence Mr. Bond held the office five years ago when the American delegates to the International Council visited Plymouth, and those who enjoyed his hospitality then will have some conception of the privileges we enjoyed through his courtesy now. The full band of the Welsh regiment, by kind permission of its colonel, furnished grand instrumental music, and the famous tenor from Exeter Cathedral, J. Dean Trotter, was among the soloists. The American speakers followed our home custom of addressing the mayor as "your Honor," which seemed to amuse our English friends, who restrict themselves to the simpler form of "Mr. Mayor." But never could the American title be more worthily bestowed than in the case of Mr. Bond, who is enthusiastically beloved by the citizens.

Let no one suppose, however, that The Congregationalist's Pilgrimage Party is having only a round of social gayeties. Beneath these enjoyable functions it is easy to see that Christian fellowship is the golden link which binds us together, and friends at home would be gratified, and perhaps astonished, to hear the applause whenever, in the public addresses, allusions are made to the impossibility of another war between the two great English speaking races. It is worth crossing the ocean to see these evidences of international friendship.

AMHERST'S SEVENTY-FIFTH WAY-MARK.

Three quarters of a century of sturdy life have just been rounded out by Amherst College, last week's Commencement marking the event. The celebration was not so formal and elaborate as the semi-centennial in 1871 was, or as the centennial twenty-five years hence is sure to be, but the alumni returned in larger numbers than usual and were sufficiently rewarded by the address of Dr. Storrs alone, which was the main feature of the Commencement dinner.

The Brooklyn divine did not undertake to deliver a long and ornate address, but his words were no less pleasing because they partook of the character of an extempore utterance, and dealt in an easy, colloquial way with the scenes of other years. He made a vivid comparison of the political, social and literary conditions of seventy-five years ago and those that prevail today, and pointed a plain and needed lesson to the young men of the graduating class, as well as to educated men in general, upon whom rests the responsibility of the future. It was pleasant to see on the same platform and at Dr. Storrs's right hand his famous classmate and close personal friend, Bishop Frederick D. Huntington, who, when called to his feet, indulged in a little playful banter with Dr. Storrs, and then went on to pay a discriminating and valuable tribute to the late treasurer of the college, Mr. Austin Dickinson.

The dinner marked the culmination of several days of festivity, in which the prize speaking contests, the Class Day jubilations, the society receptions and class reunions formed, as usual, a conspicuous part. It was notable that the addresses of the graduates were less scholastic and more directly related to the time than is often the case. Armenia's woes furnished the theme for one of the Commencement speakers and the Hardy Prize Debate had to do with the interpretation and application of the Monroe Doctrine.

The class of '56, back for its fortieth reunion, mustered eighteen of its forty-six graduates. Among them are no less than three LL. D.'s, Rev. W. H. Ward, Rev. H. C. Haydn and Prof C. H. Hitchcock of Dartmouth, who has just received this doctorate from his alma mater. The class went in a body to call on the venerable Professor Tyler, who, by the way, was sought out by not a few of the returned graduates, old and young, and who still, though no longer in the harness, receives the profound respect of Amherst men, both graduates and undergraduates.

The most notable action on the part of the trustees is the recommendation to the faculty to re-establish that co operative governing body known as the senate, which is made up of members of the four classes. Last year the alumni, at their annual meeting, after an animated discussion asked the trustees to consider this important question and their action now comes as a satisfactory response to the alumni sentiment. The trustees wisely suggest that if the senate is renewed its jurisdiction be more strictly defined than heretofore, but it is understood that the desirability of this method of self-government, instituted by President Seelye, is freely admitted by the trustees, and it is hoped that it can be re-established in a form satisfactory alike to the faculty and the students, and made to operate in the interests of the entire college community.

During the five years of President Gates's administration the funds for the college have been increased about $400,000, and its yearly income has risen from $79,000 to $106,000. The class graduating, which contains 113 members, is the largest in the history of the college, and more students are enrolled in the entire college than ever before. Fifty-three of the outgoing students are Congregationalists. Thirteen of them will go into the ministry.

The returning graduate is struck by the strength and persistence of the sentiment among the undergraduates in favor of non-compulsory church attendance. Many hoped when a year or two ago the required attendance was reduced from two services on Sunday to one that there would be a cessation in the agitation for entire freedom, but such has not been the result. On the other hand, it is very doubtful if the opinion of the majority of the graduates is favorable to the abolition of all required religious exercises. It does not take many years out of college to change one's point of view in this particular, and Dr. Storrs's utterance at the Commencement dinner to the effect that whatever else might become optional at Amherst religion ought not to, expresses the views of many men whose heads are not yet gray and whose religious sympathies are by no means narrow.

If there be any change in the external surroundings of Amherst College it is in the direction of greater beauty. The college generations come and go, but the everlasting hills retain their graceful curves and the meadows stretch away to the river clothed in grass and flowers that fade only to renew a richer life. When gazing on such a prospect the sons of Amherst find it hard to restrain a feeling of pity for the graduates of city colleges.

BELOIT'S COMMENCEMENT.

The baccalaureate was a noble message on The Optimism of Christ. The musical training of the college is one of its finest features. It is in the care of Prof. B. D. Allen, for many years the conductor of the famous Worcester "musical festival." The music at the baccalaureate service was exquisite. The prize speaking of the young women and of the young men and the Commencement exercises were in the First Church. The address before the Literary Union was by Dr. Willard Scott. Its subject was Life as a Plan of God, a standard theme, but treated with great felicity of definition and illustration.

In connection with the Commencement these were interesting facts: that Chicago has such men and so many as are in the trusteeship and alumni of Beloit; that the townspeople were present in such numbers at all the exercises, and that they were especially addressed by the valedictorian as a testimony to the close relation of town and college; that the average age of the class is about twenty-four; that Dr. George F. Morrill, recently appointed to the presidency of Washburn College in Kansas, was present as an alumnus, and that he succeeds another alumnus in President McVickar. This is the tenth year of the administration of President Eaton. The equipment has more than doubled in this time. There were never so many students. The Graduating Class numbers twenty-seven and the Freshman Class seventy. Dr. Pearsons lately said that of all the schools he had aided he had the fullest satisfaction in Beloit.

Baccalaureate Wisdom.

Counsel and Incitement to the Graduates of 1896.

THE ELEMENTS OF SUCCESS.

So of the discipline of the college classroom with which some of you are, as you would doubtless say, painfully familiar. Three hours a day of torture in digging among Greek roots, Latin syntax and mathematical mysteries. So much time wasted. So we are apt to think especially in Freshman and Sophomore years. But I declare to you, after an experience of years of pretty steady work, that I am grateful for nothing more than for the steady, close discipline to which I was held for those blessed years. I have not much to boast of in the way of success. But I can see distinctly how it wrought into me whatever patience and persistence in investigation and accuracy and thoroughness and self-reliance in brain work and other work I have had, and not a few others of these alumni will join me in this testimony. The Master made no mistake when he gave us the yoke as the symbol of discipleship.—Rev. Dr. E. P. Goodwin at Amherst College.

THE WORTH OF PERSONALITY.

We discuss communism and socialism and other methods for the improvement of society. The need of discussion and reflection we deeply feel. The woes of society are terrible. But at once we lay down the great truth that no new system of sociology, that no new social birth shall rob us of the supreme advantage, the crown of the struggles of a thousand years, the infinite worth of personality. For these thousands of years, through processes conscious and unconscious, nature has been trying to make men, individuals, persons, and to make men, individuals, persons of the highest type, of the richest fullness. Let us not be willing to undo her work or to render its continued doing more difficult.—President Thwing of Western Reserve.

THE BASIS OF MORAL COURAGE.

Moral courage rests altogether upon the sense of values. Men fight for what they know the worth of and believe in, and therefore dare not betray. The courage which is at this hour fighting for the national honor and which has won its first political victory is the courage of men who have read history to effect, who have studied values, and measured the danger to liberty of a debased currency. They will not cheapen those values which they know are as essential to the rights of the many as to the rights of the few. They know that the final penalty of cheapening is not the lessening of the rich man's riches; it is the loss of the poor man's living, his comforts, his health, his life. It is the office of the educated man, whose heart is given to the cause of political freedom and of popular rights, to stand unmoved in time of public discontent and maintain at any personal cost the saving principles to which liberty has been intrusted. It is for him to represent what the people want, not what they clamor for.—President Tucker of Dartmouth.

A PLEA FOR REVERENCE.

All vice is irreverence to self, all violation of the second table of the law irreverence to others, all sin irreverence to God. What we call courtesy is the mode by which we declare our reverence for Jesus. The power of reverence sees in all the human something of the image of God. Reverence for persons educates children, founds hospitals and gives the world the gospel. It brought Christ to the world, and brings the world to Christ. The woman who is educated in reverence learns how to detect the human and meet it at the level of its worth. Personality is august.—Rev. Dr. Lamson at Mt. Holyoke.

THE PLACE OF FEELING IN LIFE.

In the economy of life we must recognize feeling as necessary to a great life and a great day. Consider that back of all that is best in our humanity you will find great emotions. The great constructive power in the world is motive. Take the heart out of a man and what is he good for? But we cannot get great emotions unless we put our emotive nature under the sentiment of God. The man who has seen God as the limit of excellence has a heart of purity and courage that can come from no other source. Whoever goes to God for the sentiments of beauty, obligation and trust will find that with the vision of God and the passion for him he has gone two-thirds of the way to make a day great.—Rev. Dr. George A. Gordon at Williston Seminary.

IF JESUS BE NOT CHRIST.

I do not know what joy in service there can be to those who do not believe that one transcendant and divine man has appeared on earth to bind the hearts of those who aspire to live worthily and nobly to himself. I do not know what joy there can be to any who reduce the grandeur of his claims, the validity of his powers, to the level of ordinary humanity and walk henceforth without devotion or loyalty to any historically real and unique Saviour, who contemplate the gains and losses, the joys and sorrows, the victories and wrecks, the noble deeds and crimes of this life, and see in them all only the inevitable outcome of the inviolable and inexorable law of conflict and survival. I know not to what, in hours of temptation and tempest, he shall cling who finds behind the intricacies of human life only an unknowable force or believes that the all is the manifestation of God.—President Carter of Williams College.

DECADENT JOURNALISM.

The journalist is the historian. It is more important to know what is going on today than what occurred in ancient Greece. We hear the cry that murders, divorces and all crimes should be kept from the press. No! We want a press that shall tell us the vices of mankind as well as the virtues. The press is a looking-glass. We look in it every morning and we see ourselves very dirty. But we do not want to find fault with the glass. We want to wash ourselves. But there are looking-glasses and looking-glasses. The press is not today actuated by the single purpose to tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth. It is not the editor that any longer dictates to the bookkeeper, but it is the bookkeeper who dictates to the editor.—Rev. Dr. Lyman Abbott at Harvard.

LANGUAGE PURIFIED BY THE TRUTH IT CONVEYS.

But when the power of speech is transferred to the great themes of divine truth, and is consecrated to their proclamation, how it becomes transfigured! No finer illustration of this can be given than the history of the language of the New Testament. The Greek language was selected for the gospel message because of its inherent qualities—its transparency, copiousness, flexibility, accuracy, nervous vigor, melody and power of nice distinction; but it had grown up in a far different and far lower moral region than that in which it was now called to play such an important part. How the gospel lifted and purified and transformed it, and what a wonderful power of adaptation it showed to the nobler and purer ideas of Christianity. The gospel culled jewels of sacred speech from the unlikeliest places—the pesthouse, the galley-slaves' bench, the boxing match, the foot race, the gaming table, and mitered the most characteristic terms of revelry, serfdom, sordidness and cruelty to minister at its own altars. When speech has put itself into contact with the divine power of Christ, has passed into the uses of a divine economy, it becomes a new and grander power with a new and grander range of relationship by means of the exchange.—Prof. Marvin R. Vincent at Rutgers College.

The Home

IF WE HAD THE TIME.

If I had the time to find a place
And sit me down full face to face
With my better self, that cannot show
In my daily life that rushes so:
It might be then I would see my soul
Was stumbling still toward the shining goal,
I might be nerved by the thought sublime—
If I had the time!

If I had the time to let my heart
Speak out and take in my life a part,
To look about and to stretch a hand
To a comrade quartered in no-luck land;
Ah, God! If I might but just sit still
And hear the note of the whip-poor-will,
I think that my wish with God's would rhyme—
If I had the time!

If I had the time to learn from you
How much for comfort my word could do;
And I told you then of my sudden will
To kiss your feet when I did you ill;
If the tears aback of the coldness feigned
Could flow, and the wrong be quite explained,
Brothers, the souls of us all would chime—
If we had the time!

—Richard Burton.

To insist on following our own standards of right, as we mingle with all classes and conditions of people, often makes unpleasant comparisons between our conduct and that of our acquaintances. It is difficult in such instances to know where the line can be drawn between a commendable firm adherence to principles and an ostentatious exhibition of goodness which only sets others against right living. A phrase from a prayer heard long ago has often helped the writer when in danger of morbid introspection. It was a plea for growth, "not that we may be good, but that we may show in our lives the life of Christ." Such a motive does not compromise our personality, but it frees from self-consciousness. There are often, perhaps, occasions when we must disagree with our companions, but we need never be disagreeable in order to show our independence. Many concessions are possible. Christ ate with publicans and sinners.

When one stops to consider the matter it is surprising how much sorrow is for the results of actions and not the actions themselves. There are few minds that are not somewhat affected by consequences. A boy is told not to touch his father's gun. He disobeys and accidentally shoots off a finger. He is overcome by remorse and repents of his disobedience as he thinks, but the chances are that, had he met with no mishap, the wrongdoing would have caused him little unhappiness. Parents are sometimes at fault, because they are visibly more affected by consequences than by the sin. A child, who had been forbidden to climb a barbed wire fence, came in exultingly and boasted to his mother that he had climbed the wires without any injury to his clothes. "You are smarter than I thought you were," was her only comment. But when the experiment was tried a second time and an ugly tear in the trousers was the result, the boy was punished. The natural inference in his mind was not that all disobedience is sin, but that, if it only turns out well, most wrongdoing will escape censure.

One of the hopeful signs pointing to a more beautiful and healthful home life for coming generations was a free exhibition recently held in the Mechanic Arts High School, Boston, under the auspices of the Woman's Education Association. The exhibit was an object lesson in domestic art and economy, meant to suggest the desirability of introducing such a course of study for girls into the public schools. Two compartments, side by side, were fitted up as living rooms—one furnished simply, but in excellent taste, evinced a governing purpose of fitness as to form, color, durability and cleanliness, while the other, costing about the same amount of money, showed the effect of injudicious and unpleasant color combinations. The cool, harmonious olive tints in wall paper, floor covering and furniture in the first room contrasted strikingly with the gaudy upholstery and rugs, fantastic ornaments and ugly pictures in the neighboring compartment. The exhibit also included a collection of samples of dress goods, illustrating artistic patterns and combinations of color, as well as the proper treatment in laundering colored cotton goods.

THE INFLUENCE OF PICTURES.

BY MARTHA CLARK RANKIN.

It was at a meeting of the Monday Reading Club, and the ladies were waiting, as usual, for one of the members who was almost invariably the last to arrive.

"What a pity it is that Mrs. Smith can't be a little more prompt," said the president. "She's so bright and well-informed that she is indispensable to the life of the club. I never like to begin without her and yet it doesn't seem right that one person should waste the time of so many others. This lack of promptness seems to be her one fault, and I confess it is so inconsistent with her character that I don't know how to account for it."

"I think I do," said jolly Mrs. Kittredge. "She didn't grow up in a house where a picture called 'Procrastination' hung on the wall. My shortcomings are numerous enough, as you all know, but being behindhand isn't one of them. I believe I have never in my life been late to an appointment through my own fault, and I often thank that old picture for my habits of promptness."

"Do tell us about it," said one and another. "What kind of a picture was it that could accomplish so much?"

"Only a little framed engraving, taken probably from some magazine where it served as frontispiece. Very likely some of you may remember having seen it. It was in the days of the old-fashioned stage-coach and a family, laden with satchels, bags and bundles, ready for a journey, arrived a minute too late. The lumbering coach is visible in the distance, and the father is frantically waving his umbrella in the vain attempt to stop the fast-disappearing horses. The mother looks as if life had few more charms, while tears stand in the eyes of one of the children. At least, this is my recollection of the picture, though it is years since I have seen it. As a child I must have spent hours pondering over it, wondering where they were all going, whether they took an earlier start next day and made the visit after all, or whether they were going to a wedding which wouldn't wait for them, and so they missed it altogether. But I never failed to conclude my meditations with the resolve that I would always be on time, and the little old picture has held me to my resolution."

"Yes, I can remember having seen the same picture," said Mrs. James, "but, as I didn't grow up with it, I can't recall it quite so vividly; still I believe Mrs. Kittredge has touched upon an important truth. People often fail to realize the influence of pictures upon a family, especially upon children; if they remembered it, I'm sure we shouldn't see so many ill-chosen, and often atrocious, creations on the walls of otherwise well-furnished homes."

"I believe you're right," said another. "I'm sure the beautiful paintings with which my father adorned his home had something to do with my becoming an artist. In those days good pictures were less common than now, and I can remember often feeling a sense of relief when I went to see my friends that I didn't have to look at their pictures every day."

"I often have that same feeling now," said Mrs. Brown, "and I sometimes think that more people fail in the selection of their pictures than in any other part of their house furnishing."

"I had never connected the two things before," said little Miss Wilder, "but perhaps my love of animals is partly due to the wonderful pictures of horses, dogs and cats which made our home remarkable."

"Of course it is," said Mrs. Kittredge. "And no doubt every one of us has been more or less unconsciously influenced in this way. People don't think much about it. If they did we should see articles by famous people on The Picture That Most Influenced Me, although I confess to thinking that that sort of thing has gone quite far enough already."

"There comes Mrs. Smith now," said the president, "and for once I feel grateful to her for her tardiness. This talk has suggested many new thoughts to me. I shall go home and study my pictures with a fresh interest, and I fear that a 'divine discontent'"—

But by this time Mrs. Smith was fairly in the room, and the Reading Club promptly began the regular work of the day.

HOW SANDSTONE IS MADE.

BY PROF. G. FREDERICK WRIGHT, OBERLIN.

He must be an unfortunate boy who does not have a sand mill near his home. If he lives near an ocean, a lake or a river, he must, with little trouble, be able to see the first stages in nature's grand machinery for making sandstone.

Sand is nothing but ground-up rock. The forces that grind it reside in moving water. Wherever the waves can dash against the rocks they are slowly undermined and fall down at the foot of the precipice in loose, angular fragments of every description. The ever-restless waves do not, however, permit the fragments to remain angular long, but constantly jostle them together, and so rub off the corners until they become rounded pebbles. Meanwhile the smaller fragments, which have been worn off, are ground finer and finer until they become but grains of sand which can be swept hither and thither by the advancing and receding waves. In favored localities one can thus readily see all the stages of the process. The large rounded pebbles will lie together where the action of the waves is fiercest, the smaller pebbles and the gravel will be drawn farther out by the receding waves, the sand still farther, and where the waves are less violent the quicksand will settle, and finally the clay in still water.

Thus the waves are ever at work grinding up the rocks and assorting and distributing the grist along the shore. After ages of time the waves will thus eat far into the coast, leaving behind them broad belts of clay and sand and gravel superimposed one upon the other. It is such beds of sand and gravel which, under proper conditions, become changed into sandstone. All that is necessary to accomplish this is that some cementing material shall filter through them. Sometimes this is iron, sometimes lime, at other times, especially where there are hot springs, silica, which is a solution of sand. But the first process is the grinding up of the rocks and the distribution of the material in thin layers by the action of the waves, and in almost all sandstones the ripple marks of the water are preserved between the layers, and show themselves when the sandstone is split open.

Powerful as are the waves upon the rocky shore, however, a still more abundant supply of sand is furnished by gentler but more widespread agencies. A grain of sand is nothing but a speck of quartz, a mineral which is widely disseminated throughout the rocks over the whole world. But, while the waves reach only the shore line, the whole breadth of the continent is subjected to the action of frost and sunshine, and dews and rain—all of which gradually dissolve the rocks and loosen the particles of quartz that happen to be near the surface. These are then washed down into the rills, and thence into the brooks and larger streams, and thus borne onward to the sea.

The running water now furnishes the force which rubs the fragments together and grinds them into powder. Wherever there is an eddy in a stream a portion of the sand accumulates to await the transporting power of a flood. At length, when the river reaches the pond or the lake or the ocean, it deposits its burden of sand in the still water and builds up a delta or forms a bar. Those who live near the mouths of large streams know how difficult it is to keep the harbors from filling up, or to prevent the formation of a bar which shall prevent ships from going out and coming in. This burden of sand brought down by the rivers greatly exceeds in quantity that which is ground up directly by the dashing of the breakers against the shore. But when once brought to the margin of the sea it is distributed by the waves in the manner already described.

Every one is familiar with the rapidity with which milldams and small lakes fill up with sand. An interesting question arises, Why are not all the lakes full? The answer is, Because they are young; they have not been in existence long enough to become full; but in time they will all fill up, for sand does not evaporate as water does. All over the world, wherever the geologist finds sandstone, he knows that there a body of water once existed which has been filled up; and observation shows that this silting up of lakes and gulfs and bays is going on at an astonishing rate. The delta of the Nile is now 100 miles long and 200 wide; the delta of the Mississippi covers nearly 14,000 square miles. Since Abraham's time the Tigris and Euphrates Rivers have so filled up the upper end of the Persian Gulf that the site of Ur, which was then a seaport, is now 100 miles inland. And so everywhere the streams are washing down the soil from the interior of the continent and spreading it out about their mouths to form the sandstones which shall appear in future geological ages. Geology is not a dead science but a living one, whose forces are busily at work all around us.

A LOST FOURTH.

BY JUDITH SPENCER.

"Hello, Ray Dinsmore's come! Hi, Ray, how are you?"

The lad in the 'bus looked out and nodded at the boys beneath the big maple tree, and as soon as he had reached his destination and said, "How do you do," to his aunt, he ran out to see them and "talk things over" until suppertime. Every summer Ray came to Lakeside to visit his aunt, but he never had come so early as the first of July before. He knew all the boys in the town, of course, and they all liked him until he began to patronize them, when they would agree in thinking him a stuckup city fellow.

"Say," said Ray, the next morning, to some of the boys he had met on their way to school, "what do you fellows do up here to celebrate the Fourth?"

"O, set off firecrackers, and have rockets on the green in the evening, and the band plays from half past eight till ten."

"Pshaw!" said Ray, "do you call that fun? You're a sleepy lot up here, anyway."

"What more could you do, I'd like to know?" demanded peppery Benny Lee.

"O, lots of things!" retorted Ray, coolly. "If I'd a mind to I could wake the town!"

After that Ray tried to think what he could do, and finally devised what seemed to him a brilliant scheme. But he kept it to himself, and chuckled silently at the surprise he was preparing for the quiet community.

Lakeside is situated on the borders of Lake Dean, or rather on the bay which soon expands into the wider waters of the lake. This bay is dotted with small islands, once prettily wooded but now bare masses of rock with a few bushes and patches of coarse grass. But on the farthest island, about two miles out from the Lakeside shore, the trees still stood—a thick, impenetrable-looking grove of scrubby pines—and Ray's "brilliant scheme" was to convert this grove into a giant Fourth of July bonfire. The idea that it would be wrong to do so never really entered his head. Of course he knew it was "Tomkins' Island," but Ray had heard Mr. Tomkins say more than once that the trees "warn't wuth cuttin'," and "sooner or later them woods gen'ally did git burned," and so Ray thought that he might as well have the fun of starting the blaze on such an appropriate occasion. Ray determined to go over to the island the afternoon before the Fourth to reconnoiter. So he rather loftily declined to accompany his aunt to the closing exercises of the Lakeside Academy, and as soon as she had gone slipped out and borrowed old "Neighbor" Osborn's boat—for so he intended to tell him after he had returned it—and started unobserved for "Tomkins' Island."

When Ray had found a place to land he started off to explore the "interior," carrying a newspaper, a roll of lamp wicking and a small tin of gunpowder, extracted carefully from a pack of firecrackers—these were for the mine and the slowmatch which he intended to construct. Then he meant to row over again the next day, just before nightfall, and "touch her off," immediately pulling back for home. No rain had fallen for more than a week, and the pines were very dry and sure to burn. What fun it would be to see the blaze spring up! The fireworks on the green would be just nowhere! Ray was so interested thinking of all the details of his scheme that he hardly noticed the flight of time. At last, however, with a feeling of great elation, he started for home. But when he reached the water side the boat was nowhere to be seen.

At first he thought some one had followed him and had played a trick upon him, and he shouted loudly, "You fellows bring back that boat—you can't scare me!" But no one came, and though Ray strained his ears he could hear no sound of the voices or laughter of his supposed tormentors. Then he noticed how strong the breeze was blowing, and that the waves had risen. And out, far out on the open waters of the lake, he saw something floating which looked like a drifting boat. He was in a dilemma and not a soul knew where to look for him! He had taken old "Neighbor" Osborn's boat because he had been sure it would not be missed, and now he found himself calculating the chances that its absence might speedily be discovered! If by nightfall he could see no signs of rescue, he decided to light a signal fire on some projecting ledge of rock, and they would understand that and come out for him at once. He was beginning to grow hungry and chilly in the cool breeze and thought he would put on his coat. Then Ray remembered that he had taken off his jacket and left it, with the precious box of matches in its pocket, lying in the boat.

Things were taking a more serious turn than he had realized. He moved about to keep from getting utterly chilled, and shouted from time to time at the top of his lungs in the vain hope that he could make some one hear. But after a while the darkness fell and Ray was left, hungry and cold, to pass the night on the lonely island. It was a strange chance that he, who had come out with the intention of burning these sheltering trees above him, should be imprisoned here, insufficiently clad, and without means of lighting a fire to keep himself warm. The lights in the distant town shone out one by one. How near they looked and yet how far away they were! He huddled himself together and watched them until at last he fell into a doze, from which the uncanny, half-human cry of some night bird flying near awoke him with a dreadful start of fright.

By and by, after long hours, Ray dozed again, but was suddenly aroused by a noise which brought him to his feet. It sounded like an explosion, followed by the confused jangle of bells, and it was some moments before he could collect his thoughts sufficiently to know that the hour of midnight must have arrived, and the patriotic souls of Lakeside were ushering in the glorious day of our national independence with the booming of cannon and the sound of bells. After that it was hard to get to sleep again, and the night hours seemed to stretch out endlessly. But at last he fell into a heavy slumber from which he did not awaken until the sun had mounted high above him in the cloudless sky.

Ray's spirits rose with the return of day, but the hours passed and no signs of a rescue came. And as he grew more faint his hopes fell. He had searched the little island over in vain for food, and he had had nothing to eat since dinner the day before but some sour berries and slender twigs of birch. From time to time the boom of the cannon reached him and he pictured to himself the fun the boys were having—the boys he had so contemptuously called "slow." He thought of his aunt, too, and how worried she must be over his unaccountable disappearance. How little he had ever considered her feelings until now. And then he remembered his father, and the grief it would be to him if he never should see his only son again.

At suppertime the evening before, when Ray did not return, Miss Willis thought little of it, for he was thoughtless and was often late. But when it had grown quite dark and still he had not come, she became anxious and started out to find him. She inquired of all of Ray's companions, but no one could give any tidings of him, and the doctor met her and persuaded her to go home and wait hopefully for the boy's return. But Ray did not appear, nor did the searching parties, which the doctor organized, find any trace of him the next morning, though they beat the woods and sought him for miles around. At noon Miss Willis, half distracted, telegraphed to Mr. Dinsmore: "Ray missing since last night. Come at once."

It was nearly nightfall before any clue was found, and then a party of men rowing across the lake from Pinney's camp to take part in the evening's festivities, brought a boat in tow which had been found adrift with Ray's jacket in the stern. Where, then, was the boy? Not on any of the islands the men were sure, for they had rowed past all of them hallooing and shouting but they had seen no one and had heard no sound. Nevertheless Mr. Dinsmore, who had just arrived, with the doctor to guide him, took a boat and started out at once. It was already beginning to grow dark. The wind had caught the clouds, which had been hanging low on the horizon all the afternoon, and now they were spreading black and threatening over the whole sky. There were ominous forked flashes of lightning now and then and angry mutterings of thunder, but heedless of these warnings the two men pulled rapidly on. They visited each bare and rocky island and examined every bush and crevice, but without success, and they were just heading toward the wooded island where for hours Ray had been lying unconscious in a heavy lethargic sleep when the storm broke suddenly above them.

"Pull in to shore, quick!" cried the doctor. "We must lie by till this is over. It won't last long."

Then came a blinding flash and a deafening crash.

"That struck!" cried the doctor, "on Tomkins' Island; the pines are on fire, do you see? It is spreading fas ! Hello, hark! what was that?" for mingling with the uproar of the storm they had heard the outcry of a human voice.

In an instant they had turned their boat and were pulling toward the fiery beacon which now lay straight before them. Nearer and nearer they approached the island; higher and higher leaped the flames among the pines. And now for one moment against that lurid background they saw outlined a slender figure, which swayed unsteadily for an instant and then fell forward to the ground.

"Raymond!" Mr. Dinsmore shouted. "Courage, father is here!" and as the boat darted close to the shore he leaped out upon the jagged rocks and tenderly lifted the insensible boy in his strong arms.

Ray awoke and saw bright bars of sunshine streaming in through the slanted shutters of his own window blind. He felt very weary so he lay quite still and idly tried to remember and straighten out the confused and horrid nightmare of his broken rest. It must be very early he thought and he would lie still until he heard the first popping of a firecracker, and then he would dress and go out and join the boys.

Suddenly he remembered that his window faced the west, and that the morning sunlight had never, by any possible chance, shone into it before. He sat up in his surprise and looked about him. On the lounge yonder he saw Aunt Margery asleep looking very white and tired. There was a row of unfamiliar bottles on the bureau, too, and on the stand by the bedside stood a half-emptied glass of milk! What did it all mean?

He quietly got out of bed but he felt so weak that he could hardly stand, and as he started with uncertain footsteps for the window he caught sight of his reflection in the mirror and paused, amazed. Could that big eyed, pale young scarecrow be Ray Dinsmore—himself? Then he tottered on to the window and looked out. The first thing he saw was Tomkins' Island, far out in the distance, no longer green and picturesque, for its pine trees were blasted and blackened. Then what he had been trying to persuade himself was a dream had really happened—but when? How long ago? He turned mechanically to the hanging calendar and read, "July 10." He could hardly believe his eyes. He had not only lost the glorious Fourth, but days besides!

And now there were voices in the garden below and he saw his father walking up the path with the doctor. Just at that minute, who should come darting around the corner of the house but Benny Lee, asking breathlessly: "How is Ray this afternoon?" Ray loved him for that pucker of eager anxiety on his homely, freckled face.

"Fast asleep," said the doctor, "and when he wakes up he will be himself again. I shall tell him how anxious all you boys have been."

Benny grinned. "Ray said we were a sleepy lot, and if he'd a mind to he could wake the town, and jiminy! didn't he just?"

Then Ray, too weak to stand longer, crawled back to bed again with mingled feelings of weariness and shame. After all, how mean and poor a thing it was that he had planned to do and how much needless anxiety and trouble his thoughtless prank had caused. He did not realize until long afterward, however, that a thoughtful regard for others' feelings and a watchful care for others' property was the manly trait that he acquired from his unpleasant experience on that lost Fourth.

Closet and Altar

Prayers are to the soul what the dew of God is to the flowers. Why should not that gracious dew fall even now and always for all of us upon the fields of life?

Your power will be according to your experience, but your experience must be your experience and not somebody's else. Faith in your father's faith is not faith in God. Intimacy with your mother is not knowing your mother's Saviour. Reading the Bible is not necessarily walking with Christ. Knowing a good deal about him is not the same thing as knowing him.—Dr. Parkhurst.

Thou, O Friend,
From heaven, that madest this our heart thine own,
Dost pierce the broken language of its moan;
Thou dost not scorn its needs, but satisfy.
—Dora Greenwell.

He who seeks God if he seeks anything beside God will not find him; but he who seeks God alone in the truth will find him and all that God can give with him.—John Tauler.

Think of the brokenness, the incompleteness, the littleness of these lives of ours. We get glimpses of beauty in character which we are not able to attain. We have longings which seem to us too great ever to come true. We dream of things we want to do, but when we come to work them out our clumsy hands cannot put them into realizations. We have glimmerings of a love that is very rich and tender, without trace of selfishness, without envy or jealousy, without resentment. We strive to be sweet-spirited, unselfish, thoughtful, but we must wet our pillow with tears at the close of our marred days because we can not be what we strive to be. So it is in all our living. Life is ever something too large for us. Yet this incompleteness, this unsatisfactoriness, this poor attainment, finds its realization in the risen Christ. His is the perfect life, and in him we shall find fullness of life.—J. R. Miller.

To have to do with nothing but the true,
The good, the eternal—and these, not alone
In the main current of the general life,
But small experiences of every day—
To learn not only by a comet's rush,
But a rose's birth—not by the grandeur, God,
But by the comfort, Christ.
—Browning.

O God of love, we know thou lovest us and thy love has chosen our path. We would have it so. May we trust thy choice of rough and smooth, of time and tide, of wind and shower. Give us all that we need to enable us to fight the good fight and to finish our course with joy. Thy lovingkindness is in the heavens; enable us to detect its presence in every incident of this day. Thy faithfulness reacheth unto the skies—help us to reckon upon it in every step of this day's pilgrimage. Thy righteousness is like the great mountains—may we keep it in view always. Thy judgments are a great deep—may the thought of them give greatness and meaning to the commonest duties. May all our life be great, because thou art great, and because thy spirit is with us. Enable us to realize more constantly thine all-sufficiency. We ask it in the name of Jesus Christ, thy Son, our Lord. Amen.

59. WHAT NAMES?

I.

Although around her life's low source
Misfortune's mists hung clammily,
They could not check her upward course,
This flower of all the family.
No obstacle she feared to face,
Nor swerved from her direction,
But ever sought a higher place,
And filled it to perfection.

II.

Her brother, from his early youth
A butt for jeers and railing,
Yet proved, though simple and uncouth,
His sister's stay unfailing.
Ever beside her, firm and true,
He strengthened and sustained her,
And even, on occasion due,
With gentle force restrained her.

60. ANAGRAMMATIC BIOGRAPHY.

[The emphasized words are to be transposed to form the names required.]

1. A monarch of the ancient world, called CHERUB ZAN DAZEN, distinguished in politics, war and architecture. At one time he became insane and would neither wear clothing, live in a house, nor eat human food.

2. A noted philosopher, famous for his dialogues. At the instigation of his enemies he ATE CROSS poison and died.

3. An American journalist, orator, publicist and author; also a noted advocate of Civil Service reform. Though he joined the colony at Brook Farm, his tastes were rather urban than RUSTIC.

4. A famous soldier, leader and statesman, named MR. COWELL, born 1599. At the close of a war for religion and liberty he was made ruler of his people.

5. A man of letters, critic and humorist; but a critic so gentle that his words were like BALM to the spirit.

6. A brilliant genius for war and government, at one time shaping the policy of Europe. All yielded to his power, and though devastated by war his country would always manage to raise an OPEN LOAN to meet his demands.

DOROTHEA.

A TANGLE-MAKING PRIZE.

A veteran Massachusetts clergyman, who is much interested in the "Characteristic Initials," suggests that readers for once be asked to fit the characteristics to the names instead of to guess the names from the characteristics. This exercise, his experience has shown, is a much more difficult puzzle. Acting on the suggestion, "Tangles" offers a prize of a handsome fountain pen—with gold pen point and ebonite reservoir—for the best list of "Characteristic Initials" made on the following names, all lists to be sent in before July 14: 1. Francis Bacon. 2. Thomas B. Macaulay. 3. Alessandro Volta. 4. John G. Saxe. 5. Alexander Hamilton. 6. William Cullen Bryant. 7. John H. Vincent. 8. James D. Dana. 9. Samuel T. Coleridge. 10. James Russell Lowell. 11. John Milton. 12. Samuel F. B. Morse. 13. Salmon P. Chase. 14. Nathaniel P. Willis. 15. James Watt. 16. Lindley Murray. 17. John Howard Payne. 18. Charles Kingsley. 19. Joseph Lister. 20. Giuseppe Garibaldi. Clerical friends, as well as other readers, may find this an interesting test of ingenuity and familiarity with biographical details. "Helped Beat Slavery" is an illustration of what is required, the answer being "Harriet Beecher Stowe."

THE SACRED CONSTITUTION.

BY GEORGE ETHELBERT WALSH.

If there is any one national relic that is considered sacred in this country it is the original Constitution, with the pen signatures of the famous signers. While every schoolboy is called upon some time to read, study and even commit to memory this valuable document, it is doubtful if more than a dozen who read this article will ever see the original paper, although facsimiles of it flood the country and give one an adequate idea of its appearance.

The Constitution is kept securely guarded in a massive steel safe in the State Department at Washington, and it is rarely that it comes forth to be exhibited. Efforts were made to have it sent to Atlanta to be exhibited at the exposition last year, but all that the authorities would do was to have it brought forth for a short time to be photographed. The utmost care is taken to preserve the original from any injury. This precaution is considered more imperative because of the great harm done to the Declaration of Independence when a facsimile of it was made in 1824. Through ignorance and carelessness this document was so injured that the signatures on it are badly blurred. There are two copies of the Declaration, and both are guarded as sacredly now as the Constitution. One copy is in the handwriting of Thomas Jefferson, and numerous erasures, underlines and alterations show the progressive changes made in it before it was finally adopted and engrossed. The second copy is the officially engrossed one, with the signatures of the signers.

The Constitution is in a wonderful state of preservation. There is only one copy of it, the engrossed one, with the signatures of the men who made it. The ink has not faded to any great extent, and the signatures are particularly clear and distinct, although over one hundred years old. The Constitution consists of four large sheets of parchment, twenty-two by twenty-eight inches in size. The curious chirography and capital letters in vogue a hundred years ago give a quaint and ancient appearance to the venerable document.

On the last page the signers have put their autographs, beginning with George Washington, who signed himself as "President and Deputy from Virginia." The rest of the signatures show a wide range of style, from the full, flowing, easy one to the short, cramped and schoolboy method of writing. The safe in which the paper is kept is a strong, massive affair, protected by a combination lock, the secret of which is known by only one or two officials. Should the document disappear these custodians would be held responsible for its loss, and it is safe to say that they exercise due care in guarding the paper from injury or loss.

In all matters of eternal truth the soul is before the intellect; the things of God are spiritually discerned —Robertson.

When inferior, low grade alum baking powders are being urged upon the public, it is well to remember that alum is unwholesome; its use in bread making is prohibited in some countries and baking powders made with alum are required in some States to be so branded.

The only acid ingredient used in Cleveland's baking powder is pure cream of tartar; no alum, no ammonia, no adulteration of any kind. It costs a few cents a pound more than alum powders, but it is worth more.

The Conversation Corner.

Last night I went to a high school graduation, and the valedictorian took for her subject The Homeric Greeks. She said that although those ancient people differed widely from us in most respects they were like us in this, that they loved their homes and children. But the Homeric Greeks did not have any Sunday schools or Children's Sundays! The observance of the latter began only a few years ago, but now it is one of the happiest days of the church calendar in many parts of the country. I suppose the great rain of last Sunday affected some of the public exercises, although children are brave like the ancient Greeks. For I heard last night that when a teacher asked a scholar what the Homeric men did when it rained, the boy replied, "They got wet." A letter from Maine tells of flowers and a children's choir and a sermon about children. I hear from New Hampshire of a minister who preached to the children about the world, with all its wild flowers, as God's garden, and the children as his plants, telling as an illustration the story of our Eskimo boy, Pomiuk. Now comes a letter about the Sunday close by us in Massachusetts:

CAMBRIDGE, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: Children's Sunday, the 81st anniversary of our Sunday school, was very rainy. The primary school carried banners as they came in, upon which were written the things they had learned this year—the books of the Bible, the commandments, the beatitudes, the names of the apostles, five Psalms and the Apostles' Creed. Dr. McKenzie gave a good sermon to the children, taking his text from Heb. 11: 16, and told about the two women who founded the first school in our church, Hannah Tenney and Mary Monroe. Bibles were distributed to the graduating class of the primary department. It is a custom every year for the church to do this. Every Bible has the scholar's name, the name of the First Church and Dr. McKenzie's name written in it. After the exercises plants were given to the children. Ralph C. and I each got a lantana. RALPH B.

Excellent for the children to have those five things, besides the five Psalms, fixed in their memories for life! I know about that starting of that Sunday school; I do not mean that I was there eighty-one years ago, but the first lady mentioned above told me about it some twenty-five years ago. She was then an aged woman in Billerica and said that the school was in a district schoolhouse near the "Appian Way." To show that those children give as well as get, and practice the beatitudes as well as learn them, I will add that I have just received a letter from another Ralph, sending from the "Junior Alliance" a contribution for the support "of our little Northern friend, Pomiuk." Nor is this all from Cambridge—here are some of the children themselves, in a picture which has been reduced for our page. When I heard of the "Captains of Ten," I supposed it meant ten boys who were called captains, but that is not it at all. The following letter will tell us all about it.

CAMBRIDGE, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: This club was started by Miss M. for the purpose of making good men from those boys that attended it. At first only those from the Sunday school could enter, but now any boy can be voted in. There are three divisions in the club, Squads A, B and C, arranged according to the ages of the boys. Each squad has different work. The youngest boys have a course of paper sloyd and have also their "mud-pie days," when they model in clay. In Squad B the boys, under twelve years of age and yet older than the boys of Squad C, are engaged in a course of whittling. The work of Squad A is wood-carving. The club meets every Friday afternoon for work in the different squads, except once a month, when it holds a business meeting to decide about money matters, elections, etc. At one of these meetings we voted some money for Dr. Grenfell's work in Labrador.

The young men seen in the picture are Harvard students who have kindly consented to teach the club. Our name, the "Captains of Ten," means simply the captains of ten fingers; therefore the sign on the banner consists of two hands that are ruling a line. In this way the ten fingers are shown, while the captainship is signified by a sword. If you notice a little fellow in the front row with his ten fingers displayed on his knees, I wish to say that he is in Squad C, and evidently wished to denote the meaning of the name of the club. I do not think he is a Cornerer. I do not think that there are any Cornerers except the "two Ralphs," and you may like to know that another Ralph has entered the club. I think that the first two Ralphs are in the picture. . . . Yours truly, PHILIP A.

O yes, I see them, and also another boy in the front row, on the ground, who has been a Corner member for years. As to the "little fellow" who is acting as the sign of the club, ask him if he isn't a Cornerer! The dotted lines show that I have omitted Philip's interesting account of the last outing of the club "in the beautiful woods of Newton." We can all imagine that, although one extraordinary thing is mentioned, "that many boys became extremely hungry as they longingly viewed the plump cardboard boxes, on which were inscribed Ladies' Boots or H. & D.'s Fine Hats"! But the "Captains of Ten," with its happy name, is a unique and valuable organization, which we are glad to know about. I understand that the "Captains" have been associated about seven years, and every year have a sale of the work of their hands. As every one of you Cornerers has ten soldiers under your command, you ought, in this way or some other, to train them to active and useful service. What do you suppose is the text at the head of their certificate? Prov. 12: 24. Read it.

Now for the Fourth of July—[no chance for a single firecracker, Mr. Martin!—D. F.]

CORNER SCRAP-BOOK

"Our Flag." A Cornerer has sent me a little book with that title, containing a connected account of the different flags of our country, beautifully illustrated with colored lithographs. It is just what I have often wished when in a hurry to know something about our national emblem. So I give you the names of the publishers, if you should ever want it. (Tuttle, Morehouse and Taylor, New Haven, Ct.; paper, 40 cts.; cloth, 75 cts.) Meantime, I will cut out for your scrap-books a few dates and facts, which I know you will find convenient some time.

English Flag. St. George, Bishop of Cappadocia, gave Richard Coeur de Lion, as a banner, what is now called the "red cross of St. George," about 1192. In 1606, in honor of the union of Scotland with England, James I. added the diagonal white cross of St. Andrew, making the field, which had previously been white, blue. In 1707 the two crosses were put in the upper corner, and the color of the flag was changed to crimson. In 1801, when Ireland too became part of the United Kingdom, the cross of St. Patrick, a red diagonal, was added. This is the present "royal jack," carried by merchant vessels in the corner of a red flag, by "naval reserves" (as the Cunarders) in the corner of a blue flag.

American Flag. The Puritan colonists, not approving the crosses in the flag, used, after 1707, the red flag, with some other device in place of them. This, in New England, was usually the pine tree. At Lexington there were no flags at all, according to this writer, but at Bunker Hill the pine tree flag. Let Christian Endeavor delegates to "Washington, '96," note Trumbull's great picture of the Battle of Bunker Hill in the rotunda of the Capitol, and see if the flag in it does not show the pine tree. The first "striped flag," with the two crosses in the corner, and thirteen red and white stripes, was hoisted at Washington's headquarters in Cambridge, Jan. 2, 1776. (No doubt any of the "Captains of Ten" can point out the exact place to visiting Cornerers!) June 14, 1777, the American Congress at Philadelphia enacted that the flag of the thirteen United States should be thirteen white stars on a blue field, with thirteen alternate red and white stripes. That date is now celebrated as the birthday of our flag. Washington himself is said to have drawn the design of the flag, which was made by Mrs. Ross, a shopkeeper in that city. When Vermont and Kentucky were added (see Corner Scrap-Book, Feb. 20), the number both of stars and stripes was increased to fifteen. In 1818 a bill was passed reducing the stripes to the original thirteen and making the number of stars conform to the number of States. The latter are arranged in rows, the additions being made on the first Fourth of July after the admission of a State. This week the flag shows forty-five stars, including that of the new State of Utah.

LESSON FOR JULY 12. 2 Sam. 5: 1-12.

DAVID KING OVER ALL ISRAEL.

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D. D.

Saul's royal house fell by its own weight, when the divine Spirit had been withdrawn from it and it was gradually being deserted by the people. When it had fallen David came forward to take his appointed place as king. The substance of today's lesson is in the first two verses, the rest of the passage furnishes illustrations. Three reasons are given in these two verses why David should be king of the entire nation: that he was closely united to the people, that he had long been the real ruler and that he had been divinely appointed. We are to study these three things as showing qualifications for leadership. David possessed them in an eminent degree. No other Jewish leader has ever left so profound an impression on the nation as he did. Abraham founded it, Moses organized it, but David gave to it unity and glory. Yet every man has in some degree the same qualities that David had and each may cultivate these qualities for the same end. David's first qualification here mentioned was:

1. Sympathetic knowledge of the people. They said to him, "We are thy bone and thy flesh." No one knows men well who does not love them much. David is the most lovable of all Old Testament heroes. With a manly courage never surpassed, a womanly affection which won from men the utmost devotion, a statesmanship that commanded universal confidence, faith and spiritual insight that made him priest as well as king, he stands forever as the head of the nation of Israel.

The enthusiasm with which over 1,200 chiefs gathered about him [1 Chron. 12: 23-40] had been growing for nearly a score of years. As a lad he had won a splendid reputation for skill in music, for courage, discretion, beauty and piety [1 Sam. 16: 18]. He used all these qualities in behalf of others. He would charm away Saul's melancholy with his harp, or fight the Philistine giant with his sling, or enter into a solemn covenant of friendship with Jonathan, or avenge Nabal's insult to his young men, from a genuine unselfish interest in his fellowmen. "All Israel and Judah loved David, for he went out and came in before them."

In this respect Israel's great king stands before us as an illustrious example. To cherish a hearty regard for others for their own sakes, to see in every face possibilities of likeness to God and to be in earnest to help to realize them, to foster an intelligent love for one's town and country because of their value to the people, is to fit one's self to be a leader among men. Whoever makes himself necessary to others will not lack followers.

2. Sympathetic knowledge of himself. He knew that he had been divinely called to the throne, but he sought to act like a king rather than to bear the name of king. "In times past," the chiefs said, "when Saul was king, it was thou that leddest out and broughtest in Israel." He so bore himself before them that they recognized his divine appointment to be their shepherd and prince. He studied himself as he studied them, that he might serve them well. His victory over Jerusalem is an illustrious example of David's self-knowledge. He saw that Israel could not be a great nation with an enemy in its midst. But he saw also how he could get rid of the enemy. His strategy in appealing to the personal loyalty of the army to himself, in offering a prize for bravery, in selecting the weakest point for attack, are only hinted at in the story. We do not know how David strengthened the fortress he had won, how he imprinted his own personality on it till it came to be called, "the City of David," how he won the king of Tyre to be his friend, how he impressed upon the people the fact that the Lord of hosts was with him, how, in a few years, he enlarged the borders of his kingdom twenty fold. These facts are barely mentioned, but they show the man's confidence in himself and just estimate of himself, which never exist in due proportion except in those who feel profoundly their responsibility to God.

Bravery, unselfishness and piety are not of themselves sufficient to make leaders. The people have often followed to mortifying defeats men and women who had all these qualities. The causes of temperance, education and free government have suffered much at the hands of brave, devoted, pious persons who have claimed leadership without judgment or experience. One must know himself before he can lead others. David learned his own character in the solitude of the field, the vicissitudes of the camp and the tumult of battle before he accepted his place as king.

3. Sympathetic knowledge of God. He was always frank and glad in acknowledging God's presence with him. When he told of his adventures in killing wild beasts that threatened his flock, he said, "The Lord delivered me out of the paw of the lion and out of the paw of the bear." When he went forth to fight Goliath, he met the giant's boast of his prowess by saying, "Thou comest to me with a sword and with a spear and with a javelin; but I come to thee in the name of the Lord of hosts." When he came to the throne he accepted his appointment as from God, and with it the plans of God as his own. He "perceived that the Lord had exalted his kingdom for his people Israel's sake." This sympathy with God and with God's love for his people made music in his soul which he expressed in language that has been adopted by all nations. It fitted him to lead the world's praises.

The highest privilege given to any man is to feel at home with God and to know that he has appointed him to do the work in which he is engaged. That work each one may best find out for himself. The greatest crisis in any life is when it is hesitating in the choice of its calling. Many a bark which drifts aimlessly for a time is caught at last by the current and carried, through a kind Providence, along peaceful shores. Many another is sadly wrecked, and sometimes because parents seek to carry out their own wills instead of helping to find God's will for their children. If Jesse had had his way, David would have remained with the sheep and Israel would have been without a leader [1 Sam. 16: 11]. But when he recognized the divine summons he brought his boy to receive the place designed for him. That boy caught Abraham's spirit, and in uniting Israel found that, like its founder, he was blessing mankind.

To gain the qualities we have here considered is to fit one's self for high service in any position. It is to make one's calling and election sure. David ascending his throne over all Israel is the true type of manhood, coming so near to the heart of mankind that every ingenuous youth who studies his life will be attracted to imitate his virtues.

It is on all sides worth considering (blatant ignorance or base vulgarity alone excepted) that the revolution effected by Christianity in human life is immeasurable and unparalleled by any other movement in history, though most nearly approached by that of the Jewish religion of which, however, it is a development so that it may be regarded as of a piece with it. If thus regarded, the whole system of religion is so immeasurably in advance of all others that it may fairly be said that if it had not been for the Jews the human race would not have had any religion worth our serious attention as such.—*George J. PROGRESS OF THE KINGDOM.

SPECIAL CHRISTIAN ACTIVITIES IN CITIES.

(Parallel with The Congregationalist's August Topic for Missionary Meetings.)

It would be interesting and inspiring now and then to devote a missionary meeting, or a series of missionary meetings, to the numerous religious and philanthropic enterprises in a single large city, choosing naturally the nearest local center and studying in outline its institutional churches, social settlements, rescue missions, Christian Associations, city missionary societies, efforts for children, missions to foreigners and work for special classes, such as prisoners, seamen and policemen, Salvation Army slum posts, etc. As the tendency of modern life is towards the aggregation of the population in great cities, the problem of how to evangelize the multitudes of non-church-goers becomes more and more perplexing.

A new organization which is trying to solve this problem by means of methods as old as the gospel itself is the Open Air Workers' Association of America, which has its headquarters in Brooklyn, N. Y., and counts among its officers such well-known Christian workers as Drs. T. S. Hamlin, Josiah Strong, A. C. Dixon and Rev. Messrs. R. A. Torrey and E. H. Byington. The distinct aim of this organization is to incite Christians to start and support open air gospel services. These are sometimes held in tents, but the gatherings in a public square or in a vacant city lot, with only a simple contrivance to elevate the preacher above his congregation, are often more successful in attracting the desired class of hearers. In this work sometimes a gospel wagon, large enough to carry the preacher and singers, is used. Covered with Bible texts and filled with enthusiastic workers, it soon attracts a crowd, but a cheaper and more unique instrument for Christian warfare is a gospel push cart, a convenient little hand cart, so arranged as to provide a platform for speakers and singers from which they can be seen and heard by large audiences.

Perhaps the Sunday afternoon meetings on Boston Common are as good examples as any of typical open air evangelistic services, and no one who sees the crowd, which is made up of all sorts and conditions of men—swarthy foreigners, merry children, seedy-looking loafers, men and women in bicycle costumes and worthy citizens out for a promenade—can doubt that one preacher at least has succeeded in "reaching the masses." The evangelistic meetings carried on in car stables and on the wharves constitutes another interesting phase of open air work in Boston.

Christian work among prisoners is well known and has long been carried on with a fair degree of success, but a comparatively new organization for the spiritual instruction of policemen is the International Christian Police Association. It was organized in England many years ago, but the movement was not inaugurated in the United States until 1891. The police stations are visited and half-hour meetings are held, of which singing is an important feature. The policemen's wives come in for their share of attention and special meetings for them have been fruitful of good results. The association has workers in Chicago, Philadelphia and Buffalo. New York has a Christian Police Association, which has reading-rooms and a hall where religious services are held every Sunday afternoon and meetings for policemen's children every Friday afternoon. In connection with this organization is a Police Society of Christian Endeavor and a Police Band of Prayer.

Missions to seamen have always possessed an element of romance, and as a class they are usually susceptible to efforts for their moral and spiritual elevation and appreciative of enterprises for their comfort and instruction. Early in this century there were many conversions among sailors, and efforts for their evangelization were recognized as among the most important phases of city missionary work. The first society for this purpose was formed in Boston, Mass., in 1812, and though it did not live long the movement led to the organization of similar work in New York, Charleston, S. C., Philadelphia, New Orleans, Portland, Me., New Bedford, Mass. In the year 1825 there were in the United States seventy Bethel Unions, thirty-three Marine Bible Societies, fifteen churches and floating chapels for seamen. In 1827 was organized the Boston Seaman's Friend Society, which is still pushing its aggressive work among the sailors in Boston and at its branch mission at Vineyard Haven, and the following year the famous Father Taylor opened his Bethel at the North End in connection with the Boston Port Society. In 1828 also was born the largest organization for the help of sailors, the American Seamen's Friend Society, which has its headquarters in New York and publishes The Sailor's Magazine, the oldest of the periodicals issued in behalf of seamen. Sailor's Homes, loan libraries, savings banks, asylums, rests, distribution of periodicals, temperance and C. E. societies are among the methods used to reach this class of the public servants, but to the influence of the personal work of missionaries and the evangelistic services in bethels and on board vessels in harbor can be traced the conversion of thousands of Christian seamen on our waters today.

Efforts for children in cities are almost too numerous to mention, but at this season of the year the "fresh air" work takes a foremost place. Boston, like New York, has a unique enterprise called the Floating Hospital, which is one of the most beautiful of its charities. A great barge makes semi-weekly trips down the harbor during the summer, giving scores of sick babies with their mothers a cool, restful outing in the invigorating sea air. A regular corps of physicians and trained nurses is in attendance, and the decks of the vessel resemble a hospital ward with their cots, hammocks and various contrivances for the ailing little ones. The Boston Floating Hospital is now connected with the Ten Times One Society, and Rev. R. B. Tobey, who was the originator of the movement in this city, is the chairman of the committee having the hospital in charge. The first trip this season will be made about July 10.

In studying the various forms of Christian activities in cities the local city missionary society should not be set aside for newer and more unique enterprises. The Boston City Missionary Society, under the direction of Rev. D. W. Waldron, has a deservedly high reputation for its work in the line of summer philanthropies. Last week the first visitors to Rosemary Cottage for this season, a party of forty-four women and children, left the hot city en route for Eliot, Me., full of happy anticipation of their two weeks' sojourn in this ideal summer home. The society's Fresh Air Fund also provides car rides, picnics of a day to Franklin Park and harbor excursions for the poor and unfortunate of all ages and nationalities, who gratefully welcome this opportunity to escape from the city's heat, and frequently children are sent to country homes for a fortnight's sojourn.

We are amazed at the apathy of many of our churches with regard to the antecedents of the men whom they call to the pastorate. Over and over again do we hear of a man leaving a church under a cloud and at once receiving a call to another church. We must suppose the call is given in ignorance of the facts; but does this excuse the folly? The relation of pastor and people is a very intimate, and should be a very sacred, one. No call should be extended to a stranger without full inquiry, either directly by a committee of the church, or through the secretary of the State convention, as to his reputation. Much shame and sorrow might be saved to the church by the exercise of such a precaution.—New York Examiner.

PRAYER MEETING.

BY REV. H. A. BRIDGMAN.

Topic, July 12–18. Enthusiasm in Christian Service. Acts 4: 13–33.

We see no lack of enthusiasm in the world of politics. The echo of the shouting at college Commencements and reunions has hardly died away. A stranger looking on at the stock exchange in any of our great cities would infer that men had almost gone wild over their business. It seems sometimes as if only in the sphere of religion was enthusiasm wanting. There are times, it is true, when we Christians feel the thrill and uplift of our faith. A great convention, when we meet together to plan larger things for Christ, moves us, but the question after all is, do we carry into our daily life that steady enthusiasm which makes the service of Christ so easy and makes us effective workers?

We sometimes think that if we were at the head of some of the great Christian activities of the day, if the reach of our influence were greater, then we could easily be enthusiastic, but what we are doing seems so comparatively slight that it is hard to command in it any great or sustained passion of earnestness. Our Sunday school scholars are dull or mischievous. The prayer meeting for which we are somewhat responsible lags. In our effort to do some special thing for Christ we meet with unforeseen discouragements. So we plod wearily along the dusty highway instead of soaring aloft on wings. There is all the more reason then to lay hold of sources of enthusiasm which will tide us over these depressing times.

One is the thought of identification with a great cause. However remote from the front of the fight we are, however feeble and fruitless our endeavors seem to be, we are, nevertheless, engaged in the most magnificent enterprise of the ages. We are trying to make this world like God's heaven. We are making use of those influences which alone will keep this world from being eaten out by sin.

There is inspiration, too, in the thought of the great army of workers with whom we are leagued. The members of a college society take pride in thinking of the achievements of eminent men in their fraternity. What Dr. Parkhurst, for instance, has done in New York city stimulates younger and more ordinary men related to him by special ties of college or society life. Take heart, discouraged worker, as you remember that while indifference and apathy may prevail around you, all over this world are men and women who are striving hard for Christ and are winning laurels. They are your fellow-workers in the Lord and you theirs.

I like to think also of the derivation of the word enthusiasm. The idea is God in us. This, indeed, is the great and enduring source of enthusiasm. Only as we open our lives to the spirit of God and make him the director of all our endeavors can we hope to be truly enthusiastic. With him possessing and animating us we are sure of success. He is working through us, and more and more shall we feel the joy of laboring with him. So the simplest service for Christ will have behind it a divine enthusiasm.

BOOK REVIEWS.

Books and Their Makers During the Middle Ages, by George Haven Putnam, A. M. Vol. I.; 476–1600. It is becoming that this great work of a scholar, book lover and publisher should be sent out in all the dignified elegance of the bookmaker's art. The paper, print and binding are delightful and the only lack we feel is that of an index, for which we must wait patiently until the second volume appears. That it will be comprehensive we judge from the bibliography with which the work sets out.

Mr. Putnam has given us a full and interesting account of the rise of the copyist's art in the monasteries of southern Italy, following on the extinction of the book trade in the ruined classic age, with complete sketches of Cassiodorus and St. Benedict. It was Cassiodorus, our readers may remember, who, as minister of Theodoric, formulated the doctrine of religious tolerance, so soon to be submerged by the mediæval floods of bigotry. Religionem imperare non possumus, quia nemo cogitur ut credat invitus (we must not enforce [acceptance of] a creed, since no one can think or can believe against his will). This biographical matter in regard to the fathers of the monastic book copying is followed by an account of early libraries, of bookmaking in the early universities, of the book trade in the manuscript period and of the beginnings of printing and the printer-publishers of Italy, the most famous of whom was Aldus, whose trade-mark Mr. Putnam has had stamped in gold upon his own cover.

The book is full of special learning and is for the most part well digested and flows smoothly on, except for some repetitions of matter and some unconquerable details. There is an abundance of picturesque and romantic material—the glimpses of the nuns as copyists, of the monks at work in winter-time in their cold cells, of a "skilled and zealous scribe named Richard, an Englishman, who spent many years in adding to the library; twenty years after his death, when the rest of his body had crumbled into dust, the right hand, with which this holy work had been accomplished, was found intact and has since been preserved under the altar as a holy relic;" the straits of the universities to secure authentic text-books for their students, and much besides.

As a proof of the value which was put upon the work of the copyist, we may quote the story of "a worldly and sinful Brother who, notwithstanding his frivolities, was a zealous scribe, and who had in industrious moments written out an enormous folio volume containing religious instruction. When he died the devil claimed his soul. The angels, however, brought before the throne of judgment the great book, and for each letter therein written pardon was given for one sin, and behold, when the count was completed, there was one letter over, and, says Dietrich (the narrator), naïvely, it was a very big book. Thereupon judgment was given that the soul of the monk should be permitted again to enter the body in order that he might go through a period of penance on earth." Such a book as this is of the greatest value and interest in our overcrowded age. Bibliolaters will revel in it, students will resort to it, but there is also knowledge and a widening of the sense of the relations of things, and an appreciation of the narrow chance which saved us anything of the literary product of the past, for every one who cares for the history of mankind. [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.]

BIBLICAL STUDY.

Annotations on the Epistles of Paul to the Romans and 1 Corinthians, Chapters I.–VI., by Prof. Henry E. Jacobs, D. D., of the Lutheran Seminary, Philadelphia. This is the most recent volume of the Lutheran Commentary, which draws on toward its completion. We have spoken of the preceding volumes and are glad to add our commendation of this new issue. The plan is rather expository than critical, and will on that account have a wider field. We are glad to see that Dr. Jacobs has included a translation of Luther's characteristic introduction to his commentary on the Romans. [Christian Literature Co. $2.00.]

Baptism and Feet washing by Rev. P. Bergstresser, D. D. This book grew out of the Waynesboro discussion—a public debate upon the question of the method of baptism which took place in 1879. Dr. Bergstresser has since pursued the subject more thoroughly and has produced this book as a summing up of his final conclusions in the matter of the mode of administering water in baptism. Much of the ground traversed is familiar, but the author's nice handling of classic and Scriptural references enables him to state his side of the argument very strongly. In regard to infant baptism, he rightly emphasizes its importance in view of the fact that the household is the real unit of church life. The third section of the book, upon feet-washing as a sacrament, was called out by a practical discussion with the Mennonites and takes up a subject which, so far as we know, has never been fully considered in a published book. Here, too, the work is well done, and we commend the treatise as a whole to those whom need or inclination calls to a study of the questions it considers. [Lutheran Publishing Society. $1.00.]

Patmos, or the Unveiling, by Rev. Charles Beecher, approaches a difficult topic with a power of literary resource and an enthusiasm which make it thoroughly readable. Whether we agree with the author or not in our view of the scope and meaning of the prophecies, he interests us by the skill with which he interweaves his thought into the texture of the book of which he treats. Not intent on squaring a partial view of history with a narrow and wooden conception of the revelation, he finds its visions suggestive in a hundred ways. Students of the ever fascinating Apocalyptic vision will enjoy its suggestive pages. [Lee & Shepard. $1 50.]

The emphasis put upon the use of the Psalms in the worship of many of the Presbyterian bodies has made them feel a certain proprietorship and call to champion the use of this portion of the Bible. Written in this spirit of loving devotion is David's Harp in Song and Story, by Joseph Waddell Clokey, D. D. Dr. Clokey has gathered together an immense and interesting treasure of example and illustration in regard to the use of the Psalms in all branches of the church. The book is conservative but not polemic, and its most valuable and original part is the history of the use of the Psalter in modern church life. The facts which it has assembled are perhaps nowhere so easily accessible. [United Presbyterian Board of Publication & S. S. Work. $1.00.]

STORIES.

It is nearly an impossible task for one of marked individuality to lay aside self completely and appear in another character, especially if sincerity of purpose be a marked feature of that individuality. We are more than ever convinced of this in Mr. Clemens's Joan of Arc, in which, despite the entire dissimilarity of the opening chapters to most of his other works, we are soon assured of his identity by traces of his peculiar humor. These early chapters are especially delightful. From the translator's preface, with its clear, beautiful English, giving a penetrating analysis of Joan's matchless work and character, through said translator's words to his great-great-grandnephews and nieces, we feel the heart of the poet and enthusiast beating. None but a poet could have given so charming a picture of the fairy tree which figures so conspicuously in Joan's early life, influencing her whole career.

The account of the fairies, surprised by a prosaic woman from Domremy, while dancing under this tree, so dear to Joan's heart, and her report of them to the priest thus compelled to exorcise them, together with the controversy held with "the marvelous child" thereupon (in which she came off victorious), is all given with irresistible charm. We see in her arguments with the priest and others at different times a subtle element, almost casuistical, which afterwards grew into statesmanship in her military career. The whole story of her life is given with a vigor that inspires and exhilarates the reader; but, after taking us with her into the lofty days of her sublime heroism and self-sacrifice, we cannot forgive the author an interlude of something very like buffoonery, where Joan shares in the laughter. We know her to be human, and the incident is supremely funny, but we are not in the mood for it and it jars. This and again where, after drawing a strong parallel between Joan and La Hire, the whole increasingly antithetical, he closes with a weakening anticlimax, we must regard as sins against good literary work, and wonder a little at the perpetrator. How, too, could there flow from so mediæval a pen as the Sieur's such expressions as "rest up," "shorten up," "the color of their wages," "everything was humming," "filled the bill," "jab her string"—anachronisms and vulgarisms as they are! Withal, Mr. Clemens has given us a most satisfying book and one that must live as literature. [Harper & Bros. $2.50.]

In The Broken Ring, by Elizabeth K. Tompkins, we have a Princess Lenore figuring as heroine. Through her willful, imperious nature she falls into the hands of her enemies, her father's kingdom being at war with its neighbor. Placed under surveillance of a young captain, she, despite great pride, becomes fond of him. There is a romantic story connected with his early life, and he eventually, through death of relatives, becomes a prince and wins his Lenore. The closing scene is dramatic and well handled, although the author has not throughout been wholly successful in her treatment of good material. [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.00.]

There is always an interest attaching to stories of the Jacobite rising in 1715, when the weak young king deserted the faithful followers pledged to restore his kingdom, and left them to their fate. Emma Marshall gives the story of the devotion of the Countess of Nithsdale to the fortunes of her husband in An Escape from the Tower, wherein it is told how the earl was confined there for treason, and how his intrepid wife succeeded in getting him to a place of safety just on the eve of his execution. There are several minor characters whose lives and loves woven into the story make a readable and interesting volume. [Macmillan & Co. $1.25.]

The Lure of Fame, by Clive Holland, is the story of a simple-minded young girl, reared in a quiet village in Norway, growing worldly through the possession and cultivation of a fine voice. She is estranged from the lover of her early days, but her heart swings back to him just as he loses his life in saving hers. The obscurity of the English is trying in this work, for example, "And went away with her hands over her eyes, like one who could not bear the light, and her soul illumining her face, out into the night air, in which the shadows seemed to hang." [New Amsterdam Book Co. $1.00.]

In the new edition of the works of Mark Twain we have received the Adventures of Huckleberry Finn and A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court, well printed and bound in scarlet cloth. Mark Twain is to be congratulated on the creditable work of his new publishers, and the public on the opportunity to secure so admirable an edition of his works. [Harper & Bros. $1.75 each.]

POETRY.

The Purple East, by William Watson. The poet makes a large appeal to us when in this degenerate age he abandons the singing of petty songs of individual feeling and experience for the larger prophetic office in which so many of the greatest of his fellows have appeared. It is a large opportunity which Mr. Watson has grasped and his intense moral earnestness carries us along with him and robs us of the desire to make captious objection to the form in which he has voiced the indignation of the Christian West. The book loses, as a whole, by the invariable use of the sonnet form. Only a few have been able to sustain the interest of the reader in the continual recurrence of so artificial a mold of verse, and the interest of this series unquestionably flags at points—especially when the stately measure is employed for purposes of personal attack and defense. We are content to leave the final verdict as to Mr. Watson's verse to posterity, but we can see that while there will be some sifting out of chaff in this little book it does express with great power the best feeling of Christian England and America. [Stone & Kimball. 75 cents.]

Poems and Ballads, by Robert Louis Stevenson, includes all of Mr. Stevenson's previously published poems, and more than forty additional ones. The well-known verses for children are as delightful as ever upon a rereading, showing an intimate acquaintance with children's moods and fancies, with a quaint rhythm and spirit which always appeals to them. The ballads are chiefly founded on old legends, and contain many strong lines, while the last, Christmas at Sea, though short, is full of power and pathos. [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.]

Soul and Sense, by Hannah Parker Kimball. Perhaps the most hopeful part of this book of verse is found at the end, in the part devoted to the earlier verses, whose promise is hardly fulfilled by the later work. There is enough of the poetic feeling, and the power of giving it musical expression is not lacking, but the author has suffered her steps to be diverted to the barren ways of despair, and the spirit of pessimism mars her work far too often for its best success. The world does not come to poetry for an echo of its sorrows, but for inspiration, for hope and for delight. [Copeland & Day. 75 cents.]

ORATORY AND VOICE BUILDING.

Public Speaking and Debate, A Manual for Advocates and Agitators, by George Jacob Holyoke. This is the second edition of a valuable book which has long been out of print. In its original form it was highly commended by such orators as Wendell Phillips and Dr. Parker of the London City Temple. With formal rhetoric in the scholastic sense it has little or nothing to do, but it is full of strong, sensible and suggestive matter which will be of the highest value to those who desire to make themselves influential in public life, whether in the forum or the pulpit. The keynote of the book is "effectiveness as the aim of oratory," and this is enforced and illustrated from a wide experience and reading and rather helped than hindered by the fact that Mr. Holyoke is himself an agitator and speaks without much reverence for established forms and usages. [Ginn & Co. $1.10]

Voice Building and Tone Placing, by H. Holbrook Curtis, M. D. This book, dedicated to one of the greatest singers of the present age, is a treatise on the use, training and restoration of the human voice with distinct reference to its use in rendering music. Its illustrations are practical and beautifully reproduced and printed, and the book bears every evidence of value for students of its topic. [D. Appleton & Co. $2.00.]

Public Speaking and Reading, A Treatise on Delivery, by Prof. E. N. Kirby of Boston University. The author, not unfairly, calls the ideal which he sets before his pupils the "new elocution." It is based on a conversational method and very practical aims of clearness and persuasion. He insists upon the importance of breadth of knowledge and distinct purpose in the use of words. The selections for practice are admirable in their literary quality and the book is carefully indexed. [Lee & Shepard. $1.00]

MISCELLANEOUS.

Proceedings of the First National Council of the Evangelical Free Churches. The Fourth Free Church Conference, held at Nottingham, Eng., March 10–12, 1896. English Nonconformity seems to have come to complete self-consciousness in the great council whose official report appears in this volume. English papers of the highest standing and of all shades of religious and political belief have characterized it as the most significant gathering of the year in Great Britain, dividing with the Church Congress the attention of the thinking public. We have already referred with interest to its deliberations, and are glad to welcome this complete report of the transactions and addresses. [London: James Clark & Co.]

A History of the Young Men's Christian Association, by L. L. Doggett, Ph. D. Vol. I. The Founding of the Association, 1844–1855. This first volume of what is intended to be a complete history of the association carries the story through the initial and enlarging stage of the movement. It was originally presented in the department of sociology in the University of Leipzig as a thesis for a doctor's degree, but has since been enlarged and enriched. We hope that its success will encourage the author to proceed with the preparation of the following volumes. A good portrait of George Williams, the founder of the association, is prefixed to the text. [International Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association. $1.00.]

The American Conference of International Arbitration, Held in Washington, D. C., April 22, 23, 1896. We are glad to have the minutes and addresses of the significant meeting on international arbitration, to which we have already given considerable space in our columns. It is issued in a large paged and beautifully printed book by the Baker & Taylor Co. of New York. [$1.00.]

From Harper's Round Table Library we have Track Athletics in Detail, Compiled by the Editor of Interscholastic Sport in Harper's Round Table, Illustrated from Instantaneous Photographs. How large and serious a place modern athletics takes in the education of American youth is shown by this book, which was prepared for boys in our preparatory schools, and takes up what are known as track events, sprinting, jumping and bicycling, with an added chapter on bicycling for girls. Its illustrations are instantaneous photographs from life, illustrating the form of famous amateur athletes, and the text is full of practical and sensible suggestions. [Harper & Bros. $1.25.]

Nature of an Universe of Life, by Leonidas Spratt of Jacksonville, Fla. Such a book as this gives one a vivid sense of the limitations of knowledge. Here is a man who has evidently given long and careful thought to a great subject. He has written, printed and published a book, and we, with the best will and endeavor, are entirely unable to determine what it is all about. What, for instance, does he mean by saying of man in the preface that "he comes from a being finite of the word of God in force; and goes to the man possible of a civilization possible under conditions existing at this earth"? or by this, "and that nature, including man, is in resolution of such reality and force"? We suppose these sentences mean something, but what we are entirely unable to determine. And as the preface so is the book. [Vance Printing Co. Jacksonville, Fla. $2.00.]

NOTES.

—— The Critic tells of the summer plans of seventy-six American literary people, but what are they among the hundreds who are entitled to belong to that increasing company?

—— The Dial celebrates its completion of a score of volumes with a historical review and an unusually bright and interesting number. We offer its editors and proprietors our hearty congratulations and good wishes.

—— Two English ladies, Mrs. Lewis and her sister, Mrs. Gibson, have been so fortunate as to discover among some stray leaves of manuscript which they purchased in Egypt a single leaf from the Hebrew text of the book of Ecclesiasticus.

—— We remind our readers that the $35,000 necessary to secure the Elmwood estate, the late residence of James Russell Lowell, for a public park must be raised by July 1. A large part of this sum has already been subscribed but it is the final pull which counts.

—— A novelty in bookmaking is found in a Bible for home reading which Mr. C. G. Montifiore has prepared for Jewish readers. It has a detachable preface, which can be withdrawn from the book by cutting a thread. We can think of books which would be quite readable if the preface could be left and the body of the book detached.

—— Canadian politics, just now at fever heat, have been further stirred by the granting of a degree to Prof. Goldwin Smith by Toronto University and the consequent resignation of one of the university trustees on the ground that Professor Smith's utterances in regard to the annexation of Canada to the United States were treasonable. If English Oxford made no protest, surely Toronto might have done a gracious thing for Canada's most famous scholar without its being necessary to make a fuss about his political opinions.

—— In reply to certain criticisms made on the poor quality of much of the paper now used by publishers, George Haven Putnam, in the New York Sun, gives as the reason for that fact—a reason which he admits must seem to many to be well-nigh incredible—the decrease of religious fanaticism on the eastern shores of the Mediterranean. Myriads of pilgrims used to cross those dreary deserts on their way to Mecca, every one of them being clothed in flowing garments of finest white linen. Out of their number hundreds and thousands would die by the wayside, rendering it at one time a most profitable business to strip these linen garments from the bodies and send them to the large paper factories of Europe. It was from this source, Mr. Putnam says, that the best paper was obtained, but the Mohammedans no longer in such large numbers undertake these pilgrimages, therefore not so many die by the wayside, and hence the inability to furnish so high a quality of paper.

Colorado College.

When the city of Colorado Springs was laid out a body of land about fifty-six acres in extent was set apart by the Colorado Springs Company for a college. In 1874 the land passed into the hands of Colorado College, organized under the auspices of the Colorado Association of Congregational Churches. The college was opened to students in 1874, under the executive guidance of Rev. Jonathan Edwards. The first president was Rev. J. G. Dougherty. He was succeeded by Rev. E. P. Tenney, who held the office for nine years.

REV WILLIAM F SLOCUM, LL.D.
President of Colorado College.

During his term the first permanent building was secured. It was named Palmer Hall after Gen. W. J. Palmer, the president of the Colorado Springs Company and a generous friend of the institution. In 1885 the office of president became vacant and so remained for three years. This was the darkest period of the history of the institution. Had it not been for the steadfastness and energy of a few persons who had the prophet's vision, the college would now be dead and forgotten. A vigorous campaign was begun in New England under the leadership of Prof. G. N. Marden, the money necessary to pay the debts of the institution was secured and in 1888 Rev. William F. Slocum, Jr., then of Baltimore, was called to the presidency.

Since that time the progress of the college has been steady, and during the last three or four years rapid. In 1888 the stone building occupied as the president's residence was purchased. Hagerman Hall, for young men, was completed in 1889, Montgomery Hall, for young women, in 1891, the gymnasium in 1891, the Coburn Library, built by the late Mr. N. P. Coburn of Newton, Mass., at a cost of $50,000, in 1894, and the Wolcott Observatory in 1894. In the purchase or the building of these and one or two smaller structures $119-000 has been expended during the last eight years. In addition $180,000, including $80,000 of the Pearsons fund, has been added to the endowment.

This material growth has been paralleled by the internal development. In 1888, when President Slocum came, there were seven instructors, now there are thirty-two and the expense of conducting the institution has risen during the last eight years from $8,500 to $26,000. At the beginning of this period there were twenty-five students in the college and the academy and not a single regular college student. This year there have been enrolled 247 students, about equally divided between the two branches of the institution. Five received diplomas last year, eight this year and next year there will be a graduating class of eleven or twelve. The class which has just completed its Freshman year numbers thirty-three. The numbers in the institution have almost doubled in the last two years.

But the growth in numbers has not been more marked than the growth in college spirit. Eight years ago, even four years ago, there was a college here only in the sense that professors heard the recitations of students in college work. But all is now changed. Every class is organized and class spirit and rivalry are a healthful influence. The college has entered and taken a prominent place in intercollegiate athletics, this year winning the championship in baseball and track athletics. It would be difficult to find a set of students more loyal to their institution than the students of Colorado College. Colorado Springs is a famous health resort, families are continually coming to it with their children from every section of the country. And Eastern parents and institutions are beginning to realize that students who break down in other climates can come to Colorado Springs and continue mental training at the same time that they are recruiting physical strength. Students sometimes leave Eastern institutions for a year and come to Colorado College, going back at the end of the year restored in health and entering the classes they left without any loss of time. Students from Yale, Harvard and Grinnell have done this during the last two or three years. Already in the student body about thirty States are represented.

The fact that Colorado College is in a famous health resort also makes it easy to secure, even with a limited income, the best of instruction. The teacher is exposed no less than any other man to the attacks of disease, and hardly a mail fails to bring letters, many of them from men and women of deserved prominence in their chosen occupation, asking for positions in the college. A few years ago when a vacancy occurred a search had to be made for a suitable instructor to fill it; now the question is almost entirely one of selection, often among men any one of whom would honor an institution. Consequently the average of the faculty is exceptionally high.

The college stands above all for the pre-eminence of the religious spirit. It seeks to see the meaning of life through the eyes of Christ, to judge all things by his standards, to infuse into all human relations his spirit. This it seeks to do without any admixture of sectarianism. The majority of its board of trustees are and must ever be Congregationalists, but members of most of the leading denominations are among its trustees and faculty. Hardly a denomination is unrepresented in its student body. It stands for broad-minded, reverent, consecrated, Christian earnestness.

Three years ago, at the time Dr. Pearsons made his conditional offer, the finances of the institution were in a prosperous state and its Colorado friends were able to continue to it their generous help. But the panic came, and the past three years have been full of the heaviest anxieties. Only by rigid economy and by self-sacrifice has the institution been kept out of debt. The expenditures have been met by income from the endowment funds (about $10,000 a year), tuition ($6,000—only $35 a year is charged and much free tuition has to be given) and special pledges by individuals aggregating $10,000. These pledges were made five years ago and they expire with this year. So many of the friends who generously made them have been crippled by the hard times that this source of income cannot be relied upon for the future. The college thus stands face to face with a possible deficit of $10,000 a year.

To meet the emergency Dr. D. K. Pearsons of Chicago has offered $50,000, on condition that $150,000 be raised to put with it into the endowment funds of the college. Of this sum $80,000 have been raised. A vigorous campaign is under way in Colorado Springs itself. The faculty have paid in $1,600 from their own salaries and are undertaking to raise about $10,000 more. The students have pledged $10,000 and have already paid in about $3,000 of this amount. The trustees have personally subscribed $17,500. The whole city is thoroughly stirred. There was never before so much interest in the college as now. The citizens see it is their best possession, and they are co-operating to do all they can for it in this hour of its need. A large number of canvassers are personally visiting 700 people in the city to secure subscriptions. The other cities of the State are being appealed to. Colorado will generously respond. Will the East refuse to help?

At Doane College Rev. F. A. Warfield of Omaha preached the baccalaureate sermon on the text, "Arise, shine, for thy light is come," his subject being Personality. On Sunday evening Dr. A. R. Thain delivered an address to the Christian Associations on the need of a broad Christianity. Interesting features of Commencement week were the competition of eight young men and women for the Dawes oratorical prizes and the drilling of the Doane cadets under Lieutenant Hardin. The Class Day exercise, held in the grove, was the Trial of Men in the Court of the Immortals, written by the Seniors and given in costume. At the Commencement exercises each of the fourteen graduates, of whom six are young ladies, had either an essay or oration. It speaks well for the religious influence of the college that all the members of the graduating class are professing Christians. At the meeting of the trustees a committee was chosen to plan for the celebration in June, 1897, of the twenty-fifth anniversary and for raising an endowment fund of not less than $25,000.

McGill University, one of Canada's leading educational institutions, is to receive $500,000 from a wealthy tobacco merchant, W. C. McDonald.

PASSING COMMENT.

There were many features of that recent graduation exercise at Cleveland that attracted and interested a large audience. The only painful incident of the hour was the statement that for lack of means the H. M. S. is unable to support in the field all of the young women graduates whose efforts are so sorely needed in the missionary work. It would be sadder still if these young people should now have to turn aside from their chosen work to secular employments.

In certain places where Children's Sunday is made somewhat more of a day for the gathering of children not merely into the meeting house, but into the church itself, the day is found to have a much deeper significance to the older of the little folks than under ordinary circumstances.

A church in Cleveland evidently believes, and rightly, that it is just as appropriate for a church as for a school to possess and display a national emblem, and that if anywhere the sacred spirit of patriotism should be cultivated it is in the church.

The great influx of population into a section of Minnesota, as recently brought out in a local conference, brings before the State H. M. S. problems such as Easterners can hardly appreciate.

There is an illustration in Nebraska of the way in which the work in the West and the East is bound together.

Another Boston church reports a large addition to its finances through a special effort.

SUMMER SUPPLIES IN BOSTON AND SUBURBAN PULPITS.

BOSTON.

The Eliot, Immanuel and Walnut Avenue Churches hold union services for six weeks in the summer, two weeks with each church. The services will be held with Eliot Church July 26 and August 2. Rev. S. S. Mitchell, D. D, of Buffalo, N. Y., will preach on those dates. The Sunday school and prayer meetings of Eliot Church will be kept up and the pastor, Dr. B. F. Hamilton, will spend a large part of his vacation in Bethlehem, N. H. Dr. C. H. Beale of Immanuel Church will divide his time between the New Hampshire hills and the seashore. The prayer meetings of this church will be held regularly. Dr. A. H. Plumb spends his vacation at home. The Sunday school will be suspended, but the weekly prayer meeting will go on as usual.

Park Street. Rev. I. J. Lansing has a two months' vacation, beginning July 1. The church will be open during the entire summer, and there will probably be no suspension of the prayer meetings nor of the meetings of the C. E. Society. As far as known supplies arranged for include Rev. J. L. Withrow, D. D, July 12 and Aug. 9 and 16, and probably Major Whittle July 19 and 26. Dr. David Gregg has been invited to supply Aug. 23 and 30.

Old South. The pulpit supply for the summer is arranged as follows: Dr. G. A. Gordon, June 14–Aug. 16 inclusive; Aug. 23, Rev. E H. Rudd, D. D., Albion, N. Y.; Aug. 30, Rev. H. A. Stimson, D. D., New York city; Sept. 6, Rev. S. H. Dana, Quincy, Ill.; Sept. 13, Rev. C. S. Lane, Mt. Vernon, N. Y.; Sept. 20, Rev. W. E. Barton, D. D., Boston; Sept. 27, Rev. T. T. Munger, D. D., New Haven, Ct. Dr. Gordon will spend his vacation at Andover. His assistant and pastor of Hope Chapel, Rev. G. H. Flint, takes his vacation June 21–July 12 inclusive. There will be a morning service only at the Old South during July and August. The regular evening service at Hope Chapel will continue. Rev. G. H. Geyer will supply in vacation at the chapel.

Mount Vernon will, as usual, worship with the Old South during July and August. Dr. S. E Herrick will be at his summer home at Quogue, Long Island, N. Y.

Shawmut will continue regular services during the summer except on Sunday evenings. Dr. W. E. Barton will sojourn in Foxboro, Mass. Supplies are arranged thus: Rev. C. M. Southgate, July 26; Rev. G. H. Cate, Aug. 2; Rev. H. M. Tenney, D. D , Aug. 9; Rev. W. W. Jubb, Aug. 16; Rev. B. S. Hunting, Aug. 23; Rev. G. H. Cate, Aug. 30.

Union is at present without a pastor. Services were held during June, after which they were discontinued, not to be resumed until the first Sunday in September. The Sunday school adjourned after Children's Sunday.

Berkeley Temple. Dr. C. A. Dickinson will be absent on his vacation in Westminster, Vt. Regular services of the church and Sunday school and the usual prayer meeting will continue.

Olivet. Usual services will be held during the vacation season with Sunday evening meetings, Sunday school and prayer meetings. The pastor, Rev. Donald Browne, will preach.

Roslindale. The services of this church during the summer will be continued as usual. The pastor, Rev. R. B. Grover, will be away during August at Randolph Hill, White Mountains, N. H. The pulpit supply is not wholly arranged as yet.

SOUTH BOSTON.

Phillips. The church will be open all summer, but an evening service will not be held. The Sunday school and prayer meetings will be continued. The pulpit will be filled as far as planned by Rev. C. A. Vincent of Sandusky, O.; Rev. Alexander Milne of Columbus, O.; Rev. W. S. Palmer, D. D., of Norwich, Ct. The dates are not known. The pastor, Rev. C. A. Dinsmore, will take a bicycle trip through England and Scotland.

EAST BOSTON.

Maverick discontinues its Sunday evening service only. Its Sunday school and prayer meetings are held as usual. Dr. Smith Baker, the pastor, will supply the Union Park Church, Chicago, at least part of the summer.

DORCHESTER.

Second. Dr. Arthur Little will spend his vacation at the seaside and among the hills within a hundred miles of Boston. The pulpit arrangements are: July 26, Rev. J. E. Tuttle, D. D., Amherst College; Aug. 2 and 9, Rev. C. I. Scofield, Northfield, Mass.; Aug. 16, Rev. E. N. Packard, Syracuse, N. Y.; Aug. 23, Rev. C. S. Mills, Cleveland, O.; Aug. 30, Rev. F. H. Means, Windham, Ct.

Pilgrim will be open all summer, with an evening service and regular prayer meetings, but no Sunday school session in July and August. Rev. W. H. Allbright, D.D., the pastor, will be in the Adirondacks for his rest. The supplies are: Aug. 2, Rev. J. L. Sewall, Kansas City; Aug. 9, Rev. J. Q. Adams, Clifton, N. Y.; Aug. 16, Rev. F. W. Palmer, Auburn, N. Y.; Aug. 23, Rev. I. Jennings, D. D., Elmira, N. Y.; Aug. 30, Rev. Samuel Jessup, D. D., Oneida, N. Y.

Central continues its services, including Sunday school and prayer meetings, during the summer, and a prayer and conference service will be held Sunday evenings. Rev. P. B. Davis is pastor.

CHARLESTOWN.

First has called Rev. C. H. Pope of Cambridge, Mass., who, after two months in England, will occupy the pulpit the first Sunday in September. The regular services, all but the C. E. meetings, will be discontinued during July and August.

Winthrop. Rev. C. R. Brown will go to Iowa this summer and spend some time at his father's home. The church will continue regular services except during August, holding the Sunday school, prayer meetings and morning and evening services as usual.

ALLSTON.

Rev. J. O. Haarvig, the pastor, will take his vacation in August on the Maine coast. The church will be open during the summer, but no evening service will be held. The Sunday school and prayer meetings will be kept up. Beginning the second Sunday in August it is expected the supplies will be: Mr. John Quint, Rev. I. W. Sneath of Cambridge, Dr. C. H. Taintor of Chicago and Dr. H. D. Hunter of Calumet, Mich.

JAMAICA PLAIN.

Central. The regular services, except the Sunday school session, will be continued all summer, morning and evening worship included. The pastor, Dr. C. L. Morgan, will spend his vacation in the vicinity of Boston. The supplies arranged are: Aug. 9, Rev. F. E. Butler, West Roxbury; Aug. 16, Rev. W. E. Barton, D. D., Boston; Aug. 23, Rev. J. E. Tuttle, D. D., Amherst; Aug. 30, Rev. C. S. Mills, Cleveland.

Boylston. During the vacation of Rev. Ellis Mendell at Bass Rock, Gloucester, Mass., his assistant, Rev. F. L. Luce, will preach. The regular services, including those of the Sunday school, Sunday morning and evening and midweek prayer meeting will continue.

BRIGHTON.

The church will be open all summer. There will be no evening service. All other services continue as usual. Rev. Messrs. J. V. Clancy, Wolcott Fay, G. A. Brock and others will supply. The Bible school will be closed in July and August, but prayer meetings continue. Dr. A. A. Berle, the pastor, will spend the summer in the English Isles, chiefly in England and Scotland.

BROOKLINE.

Harvard. Dr. Reuen Thomas will take his vacation as usual during July and August. His time will be spent abroad, and he will preach at the City Temple, London, Rev. Dr. Parker, pastor. The morning and evening Sunday services of the church will be continued as always, and the pulpit will be supplied as follows: July 5, Pres. W. De W. Hyde of Bowdoin College; July 12 and 19, Pres. W. J. Tucker of Dartmouth; July 26 and Aug. 2, Rev. Dr. R. R. Meredith of Brooklyn; Aug. 9, Rev. Charles Wood, D. D., of Philadelphia; Aug. 16, Pres. M. E. Gates of Amherst; Aug. 23 and 30, Rev. John Wood of England.

CAMBRIDGE.

Wood Memorial. The pastor, Rev. I. W. Sneath, and his family will spend the summer at Nauset Harbor, East Orleans, Mass. The services of worship and Sunday school will be held as usual. The pulpit will be supplied during July and August by local talent.

Hope. The pastor, Rev. C. M. Carpenter, will probably take a vacation in August, remaining at home during July to be of service during the absence of other pastors.

WEST SOMERVILLE.

Day Street. The pastor, Rev. Peter Mac Queen, will be on his vacation during July and August, when he intends to visit Rome and Athens. Rev. Richard Meredith will supply the pulpit, and meantime a new front will be added to the church building. The work has been already begun, the Boys' Brigade digging the new foundations.

CHELSEA.

First. Dr. R. C. Houghton's vacation will occur July 7-Sept. 1. He will go to western and northern New York, spending considerable time at Thousand Island Park, St. Lawrence River. During July the congregation will worship with the Central Church, and in August the Central Church will worship with this church.

Central. Rev. C. E. Jefferson will spend his vacation of eight weeks at his summer home in Fitzwilliam, N. H. The church unites with the First Church for regular worship for eight Sundays, as noted above. All other services go on as usual. The supplies are: Rev. C. H. Caton, Chicago, July 12; Rev. H. A. Bushnell, La Grange, Ill, July 19; Rev. F. G. Hopkins, Dubuque, Io., July 26; Rev. I. W. Sneath, Cambridge, Mass., Aug. 2.

EVERETT.

Mystic Side. The pastor, Rev Albert Watson, expects to spend his vacation with friends in England during July and August. Services will be held all through the summer as usual. Dr. J. W. Wellman will preach July 5. Other supplies are not definitely settled.

MELROSE.

Highlands. The pastor, Rev. B. F. Leavitt, will go as usual to Mt Desert for his vacation The regular services and Sunday school will be maintained, and plans are forming for extra work in the form of open air meetings.

REVERE.

First. Rev. W. S. Eaton will take his vacation during August. None of the regular services will be given up during the summer. The Sunday school, Y. P. S. C. E., weekly prayer meeting, and preaching services both morning and evening will be held during the vacation.

SAUGUS.

Rev. J. C. Labaree will spend his vacation at Intervale, N. H., during August. Probably the church will be open, as usual in vacation, alternately every other Sunday for preaching and for Sunday school and prayer meeting.

HYDE PARK.

First. The vacation of Dr. A. W. Archibald will include the last Sunday in July and the five Sundays of August. The following supplies are arranged in order: Rev. C. H. Beale, D. D., Roxbury, Mass.; Rev. C. R. Brown, Charlestown, Mass.; Rev. C. L. Morgan, D. D., Jamaica Plain, Mass.; Rev. C. S. Brooks, Hyde Park, Mass.; Evangelist C. L. Jackson, Roxbury, Mass.; Rev. W. E. Barton, D. D., Boston. The women's and the Junior Endeavor meetings will be omitted, but the Sunday school and weekly prayer meeting will be continued. Dr. Archibald will go on a carriage drive to New Haven, to the Catskills and probably to seashore resorts along the Massachusetts coast.

NEWTON.

Eliot. Dr. W. H. Davis will spend his vacation at the "Binnacle," his summer home at Harwichport, Cape Cod, Mass. This church will unite with the Baptist and Methodist churches for services during August and part of September. Pres. W. G. Sperry of Olivet College and Rev. Mr. Babcock of Baltimore will be the supplies.

First. Rev. E. M. Noyes expects to be away the first four Sundays in August, spending part of the time at Squirrel Island, Me. The church services will be continued all summer. The Sunday school and C. E. Society will probably not meet during August. Pulpit supplies are: Aug. 2, Rev. J. H. Morley, Minneapolis; Aug. 9, Rev. W. S. Hawkes, Salt Lake City; Aug. 16, Rev. O. W. Folsom, Bath, Me.; Aug. 23, Rev. C. L. Goodrich, Plainfield, N. J.

Highlands. Rev. C. E. Havens will spend his vacation at Shelter Island, N. Y. Regular services will be held, Rev. Lawrence Phelps acting as supply.

North. The pastor, Rev. Daniel Greene, expects to spend part of his vacation among the hills of Oxford County, Me., and a part at Mr. Moody's convention for Bible study. The church services will be continued as usual. The pulpit will be supplied, but arrangements are not yet completed.

NEWTONVILLE.

Central. The Sunday school and evening service will be omitted in July and August. The pastor, Rev. J. M. Dutton, and his wife will spend the month of August in New York and Saratoga. Supplies for vacation are: Aug. 2, Rev. J. S. Williamson, Augusta, Me.; Aug. 9, Rev. H. T. Barnard, Bradford, Vt.; Aug. 16, Rev. H. J. Patrick, D. D., Newtonville, Mass.; Aug. 23, Rev. W. B. Green, Pomfret, Ct.; Aug. 30, Rev. W. F. Slocum, D. D., Colorado Springs, Col.

Thirty-five churches send in their reports. The data received from these show that eighteen will have regular services on Sunday, also the Sunday school and prayer meeting; eight will join with other churches in union services through part of the summer; six discontinue Sunday evening services; one discontinues all services through July and August; one discontinues all services except the C. E. meeting; one has, besides regular services, plans for extra work; and one is open on alternate Sundays.

A NEW PROBLEM FOR A CONGREGATIONAL COUNCIL.

It frequently falls to the lot of Connecticut councils to deal with the knotty questions which now and again arise in regard to Congregational procedure. Another of these difficulties arose unexpectedly last week in a large council called by the Church of the Redeemer, New Haven, Ct., for the purpose of installing Rev. Harry E. Peabody as assistant pastor. It was discovered that Mr. Peabody, who had been installed by a council in 1892 as pastor of the church in Trinidad, Col., had not been dismissed by council from that pastorate. He had indeed resigned from that pastorate to accept the New Haven call and the church had accepted the resignation, although there were no documents to this effect except a letter of church dismissal to the New Haven church. He also brought a letter of dismissal from the Arkansas Valley Association of Ministers and Churches, and it was evident that his removal was not lacking in publicity, nor was it without the consent of the people at the West, but it had not oc curred to any one that a dismissing council was necessary. Churches are very widely scattered there, and they are not accustomed to this formality.

To avoid establishing a precedent which would be detrimental to good usage in our polity on the one hand, and on the other to act with the freedom and sanctified common sense befitting our order, was a problem which required considerable deliberation. There was a manifest desire on the part of the council to do what the church had called it to do, and so the following minute was eventually adopted:

Whereas, It appears that the Rev. Harry E. Peabody has been installed as pastor of the Congregational church of Trinidad, Col., and, further, that at his own request he has been dismissed by a vote of that church from its pastorate, first, without the calling and advice of a council; therefore this council, in voting to proceed to assist in Mr. Peabody's installation as assistant pastor of the Church of the Redeemer of this city, adopts the following minute as expressive of their reasons for departing in this instance from the customary Congregational method of procedure:

First, We do not intend thereby to contravene or to diminish the force of our general Congregational usage of calling advisory councils as representatives of the fellowship of the churches in the dismissal as well as the installation of pastors. On the contrary, we would reaffirm, as important to the orderly existence of our Congregational churches, this, our historic, usage.

Second, Statements, however, having been made to us regarding the customs prevalent among the Congregational churches in Colorado in dismissing pastors without advice of councils, especially in view of the difficulty of securing such councils in localities where the Congregational churches are widely separated, we are therefore satisfied that no discourtesy will be imputed to us by the general Arkansas Valley Association or by the Congregational churches which participated in the installation of Mr. Peabody. If, notwithstanding this irregularity in his dismissal, we now proceed to his installation in another charge, we wish expressly to disclaim any intention of disregarding the wishes or advices of the churches of Colorado, which have not been called together, as is the custom with us, to advise in regard to Mr. Peabody's dismissal.

Voted further, That this explanation or action be sent to the clerk of the Congregational church in Trinidad, Col., and also to the clerk of the Arkansas Valley Association.

CONFERENCES AND ASSOCIATIONS.

ME.—Aroostook Conference held its 50th annual session at Masardis in the heart of the region newly opened by the branch railroad to Ashland, 30 miles from the main line. Mr. Thomas Martyn of Bangor Seminary began work here last summer and is stationed here again this summer. The sermon was by Rev. J. S. Strong. The chief interest of the occasion was the historical address of Rev. J. E. Adams, D. D., reviewing the Maine missionary work in the county for the last 50 years, during which time no church has existed there without help from the society. The religious work has been and is essentially missionary work, and hopeful and important to the State.

York Conference met at Alfred for its 74th annual meeting. About 75 members represented 15 churches. The sermon was by Rev. F. P. Estabrook. Topics were: How Far Are Churches and Ministers to Go in Public Reforms, Features of Church Work to Be Emphasized, Literature of the Christian Home, The Holy Spirit a Practical Force in the Church, Congregationalism—Its Advantages and Disadvantages to Our Churches and Ministry. Rev. William Shaw of Florida spoke for the C. S. S. and P. S., and Rev. J. K. Browne of Harpoot was listened to with earnest attention upon the Armenian situation and was solicited to occupy the time of the second sermon, continuing his story. A woman's meeting of interest occupied an hour.

MINN.—Northern Pacific Conference held a large and enthusiastic meeting at Brainerd, June 16–18, Only two fields were not represented, either in person or by report. The topics were: The Opening of the Red Lake Reservation, The Leech Lake Country, The Iron Range, and Railroad Development. Much interest was awakened in the opening of the reservation and adjacent lands to new settlers. According to the land commissioner 50,000 new settlers have come into the State since Jan. 1, and nearly all have gone into northern Minnesota. In view of the large prospective developments, an appeal was made to the H. M. S. to put more funds and men into northern Minnesota, the present being critical time. Other topics were: The Higher Life of the Churches, Development of the Smaller Churches, The Privileges and Duties of the Congregational Woman, Week Day Classes for Children, Bible Study, The Southern Problem, Sunday Schools, and Aggressive Congregationalism. Rev. C. E. Harris, the new pastor at Moorhead, preached the sermon. Work has been commenced at several new points—Walker, Hibbing, New York Mills, Blufton and others—during the conference year, but there are many more fields that are neglected.

CLUBS.

MASS.—The Connecticut Valley Club held its last meeting June 16 in Easthampton. Arbitration was the subject and the discussion was carried out by Prof. T. S. Woolsey of Yale and Dr. Washington Gladden. Rev. W. S. Hawkes also gave an address.

The Berkshire Club met in Pittsfield June 26. Pres. B. T. Washington of Tuskegee Institute spoke on Solving the Negro Problem in the Black Belt. President Carter of Williams and others followed with brief addresses.

NEW ENGLAND.

Boston.

EAST BOSTON.—Maverick, Dr. Smith Baker, pastor, is in good condition. Its meeting house and parsonage are all paid for. The current expenses of the past financial year are all met and last Sunday morning $2,650 was raised towards refrescoing the audience-room, and all this in spite of the fact that during the last year and a half more than 50 of the families of the church have moved out of East Boston.

Massachusetts.

EVERETT.—Courtland Street. The Y. P. S. C. E. is beautifying the interior of the house of worship. The members are anxious to provide also a new pulpit, as the present one is inferior. Rev. R. H. McGown is pastor.

HYDE PARK.—At the annual meeting in June nearly 300, the largest number ever reported, gathered round the tables for a simple collation, which was followed by reports of officers, and by responses from the different societies in the church. The year closed with all bills paid from the regular income and with over $200 in the treasury. Dr. A. W. Archibald is pastor.

FALL RIVER.—The Pioneer Jubilee Quartet of Atlanta University gave two concerts in this city last week—one at Central Church chapel and one at the mission. Good contributions were taken for the scholarships of the university.—Central. The recent communion service was of especial interest. The church and its mission has long taken a deep interest in the Chinese of the city. Many of them have been gathered into its Sunday school. The first one to make a public confession was received into the church by Rev. W. W. Jubb at this service. An interpreter was present and 12 other Chinamen beside the candidate. Others are expected ere long to take the same stand.

MARION.—Rev. H. L. Brickett gave the address on The Career of Judge Stephen Gordon Nash at the dedication of the Gordon Nash library building in New Hampton, N. H., on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the New Hampton Literary Institution. Judge Nash gave about $50,000 for the library building and its endowment. Mr. Brickett was the former pastor of Judge Nash at Lynnfield Center.

WORCESTER.—Hope sustains a loss in the death of Mr. Lorin Foskit, who was a charter member of the church and for some time the only male member. He had been deacon and moderator of its meetings from the time of organization until his death, and at one time when dissolution of the church was advised his loyalty tided over the stress until success came.—Y. M. C. A. The general secretary, Mr. Abbott, has returned from a six weeks' vacation in Europe. The boathouse of the association at Lake Quinsigamond was formally opened last Friday. For $3 any young man can have the privileges of the boats, bathing and large building for the season. The lake department has not only been a blessing to the young men but also a source of revenue to the association.—Church picnics have been the order the past two weeks, sports and contests being a prominent feature.

SPRINGFIELD.—Park. The church recently showed its lively appreciation of the services of Rev. E. H. Knight, teacher in the School for Christian Workers, who has been of substantial aid here for eight months in acceptable pulpit service, and especially in wise counsel and energetic leadership in their trying experiences of financial reorganization. The church presented him with a fine edition of Larned's History for Ready Reference and a mahogany table. This is a beautiful consummation of the spirited and honorable endeavor of this church to overcome embarrassing obstacles to a healthy and prosperous life. Its path now seems clear and the way promising to a healthy and vigorous church life under the pastorate of Rev. A. E. Cross, who is showing great wisdom in his work and winning all hearts.

Maine.

NORTH BANGOR.—A church of 40 members was organized June 21. Rev. J. S. Penman offered the prayer of consecration and Prof. J. S. Sewall received the members and extended the fellowship of the churches, baptizing 20 persons and receiving 30 on confession and 10 by letter. The service was uplifting. Mr. Edward Newcomb of the seminary has supplied here and has been very helpful in securing the present result. Though the members were of various denominational preferences, all unite in the Congregational polity.

SOUTH BREWER.—The meeting house was damaged somewhat by lightning in the recent severe storm. The midweek meeting was being held in the chapel near by, but this building was uninjured.

TURNER.—The A. M. A. work was lately presented by Mrs. Woodbury in an interesting address, and at the close the church made a jubilee pledge of $50 to the debt.

Rev. J. B. Carruthers of Berlin has been assisting the missionary work among the woodsmen at Errol and Wilson's Mills.——Mr. T. W. Harwood of Bangor Seminary is supplying in Garland satisfactorily. ——Mr. Clinton Simonton of South Portland has filled the pulpit in Lovell acceptably, and it is hoped to secure his future services.

New Hampshire.

EXETER.—Second. The proposal of the First Church for permanent union with this church has been officially declined, while acknowledging and reciprocating the fraternal spirit suggesting it, for these reasons: The feeling of a large and influential part of the members is that they cannot give up their corporate existence and historical connection with the academy, and are sacredly bound to build an edifice in the academy grounds for joint use, as was the present old structure; and with this understanding so many pledges have been made and so much sympathy enlisted at home and abroad obligation demands a going forward; legacies and trust funds held by the parish might revert to heirs if the corporate existence should be surrendered, and, as neither parish is embarrassed by financial weakness, the exigencies of the case do not make such steps necessary for their continued life and prosperity; as the town is a growing one and the families connected with each are nearly enough to fill both houses, it seems best to continue to work separately but more aggressively, meanwhile maintaining towards each other fraternity of feeling and fellowship in a common heritage ——The C. H. M. S. receives $200 and the C. E. S. $300 by the will of the late Mrs. Clara A. Haley of this city.

MERIDEN.—Mr. John Bryant of Boston, Mass., has generously offered to give $6,000 towards building a new edifice to take the place of the one burned some months ago, provided the new house be built of stone. The matter has been taken under consideration.—— Kimball Union Academy receives $5,000 from the estate of the late Dr. E. K. Baxter of Boston, Mass.

Vermont.

RUTLAND.—The 10th anniversary of the installation of Rev. G. W. Phillips, D. D., over this church was celebrated June 18–21. On Thursday evening a reception was given by the people to their pastor and his wife, at which more than 500 persons were present. A handsome china dinner and tea set was presented as an expression of love and esteem. On June 21 Dr. Phillips preached an anniversary sermon, saying many tender and appreciative words to the people, speaking especially of the harmony which had always characterized the church. The additions during the decade have been 433 and the losses 304. The benevolent offerings have amounted to $33,000. The present membership is 771. Mr C. N. Thorp is assistant the present season.

Rhode Island.

PROVIDENCE.—Union. During the summer the preachers in this pulpit will be Dr. J. L. Withrow of Chicago, Dr. James M. Patterson of Detroit, Dr. Henry M. Ladd of Cleveland, Dr. H. A. Stimson of New York and Dr. E. B. Webb of Wellesley. The Atlanta University Quartet visited the midweek meeting of late and $25 were contributed for their university. Last week, Sunday evening, the quartet was present at Pilgrim Church and gave Southern religious musical selections and addresses in behalf of the university, for which $40 were contributed.

RIVERPOINT.—The C. E. Society has gathered and shipped over 300 articles of clothing for the relief of the Armenians in Smyrna.

MIDDLE STATES.

New York.

RICHFORD.—At the church in this place a phonographic entertainment was given on the evening of June 26 under the auspices of the Y. P. S. C. E., the proceeds to be devoted to a stone walk before the meeting house.

SALAMANCA.—At the Children's Day service 12 children were baptized and at private residences three other persons.

New Jersey.

ORANGE.—The annual meeting recently was concluded with a social. The pastor, Rev. C. A. Savage, read a historical narrative covering the six years of his pastorate. Special contributions to the society treasury were made, enabling it to conclude the year free of debt and to lay up $400 to meet special needs in the fall. The church expenditures for the year have been about $6,200 and the beneficence $1,056. On Children's Day 24 children received prizes for regular church attendance during the year past, five having been present 52 Sundays.

PASSAIC.—The pastor, Rev. W. I. Sweet, has just sailed for Europe, the church having given him an extra month's vacation. He will spend July and August abroad, and expects to take a bicycle tour with his brother through Great Britain and on the Continent.

THE INTERIOR.

Ohio.

CLEVELAND.—Trinity. The Sunday school presented the church with an American flag on Children's Day. The flag will be displayed on holidays and on other patriotic occasions. The pastor, Rev. R. A. George, has received a number of letters from old soldiers and others congratulating the church on its gift.——The Bible Readers' School observed its 10th anniversary, June 25, with graduation of a class of five, all Bohemians, who presented essays. Addresses were made by Rev. John Prucha, Bohemian pastor of Bethlehem Church, in Bohemian, and Dr. Hutchins of Woodland Avenue Presbyterian Church in English. Dr. H. A. Schauffler reported a satisfactory year with 10 pupils, Bohemian, German and Slovak. A reorganization of the Ladies' Board was effective as an attempt to interest a larger constituency in this important work. ——The Archwood Avenue and the Lakewood Churches are planning to build this season.

TOLEDO.—First closes its audience-room for two months for a thorough renovation in view of the coming of the American Board in October. Rev. D. M. Fisk is pastor.——A new church, the seventh, was organized in this city June 29 with over 60 members and a Sunday school of nearly 100 This church has paid for a site and will at once erect a commodious chapel.

Illinois.

KIRKLAND.—The recent dedication of the new edifice marks an epoch of more than ordinary importance for this village. The church was organized in 1894, when there was but one English-speaking church in that community. Its affairs were controlled by an outside centralized ecclesiastical organization in such manner as to repel a large majority of the people. The best people in the village and its vicinity asked for sympathy and assistance in organizing a church on the simple New Testament basis. One month's service by an evangelist of the Illinois H. M. S. resulted in the gathering of a church of over 80 members. But before the church had become accustomed to work, or had secured a pastor, smallpox became epidemic in the village and all public gatherings were prohibited. For three months this condition continued, but the church gave evidence of its stability by vigorously moving forward. With aid from the H. M. S., Rev. L. A. Holp was secured as pastor, the various lines of church activity were put in operation and the erection of a house of worship was soon undertaken. Business men subscribed liberally, devoted women devised plans for raising money and seemed to find it where nobody believed it existed. The young people also joined in the work. The dedication services occupied an afternoon and an evening. The audience-room and the room for social meetings, which are separated by a rolling partition, were filled. Field Secretary C. H. Taintor preached in the afternoon, and the other parts of the service were conducted by Rev. Messrs. William Pierce, J. S. Rood, E. W. Huelster, G. W. Rexford and James Tompkins, D. D. In the evening Dr. James Tompkins preached the sermon and offered the dedicatory prayer. The building cost a little over $5,000. The people gave nearly $1,000 of this the day of dedication. It is a beautiful structure, both externally and internally, and is well adapted to all lines of church work.

Indiana.

TERRE HAUTE.—First. Dr. J. H. Crum closed an eight years' pastorate with this church June 28. After a month's vacation Dr. Crum will take charge of the lately organized Beacon Hill Church, Kansas City, Mo. The latter church has been formed by a union of the old Fourth Church and the people from the First Church and others for the purpose of forming a strong uptown church. It will be self-supporting from the start. Much regret is felt in Congregational circles in Indiana over the departure of Dr. Crum. He has been active in many lines of usefulness and it will be hard to fill his place.

FREMONT.—Rev. Jacob Winslow, recently called here, has taken up the Jamestown work also. Committees of the churches arranged that he might preach at Jamestown every other Sunday morning, alternating with the afternoon service. Fremont has a service every Sunday evening, besides every other Sunday morning. A present of some church hymnals which have been laid by by some other church would be greatly appreciated. The people are sacrificing to pay the salary, since missionary aid has been greatly reduced.

SOLSBERRY.—Mr. G. K. Miller, a lay worker, has recently made a thorough visitation of this pastorless church and the outlying neighborhood. There is a revived religious interest and he reports that the people are anxious for the renewal of regular services. At the recent communion season held here by Superintendent Curtis eight persons were received and others will come later.

INDIANAPOLIS.—Rev. S. W. Pollard, who has gone to Postville, Io., hopes for renewed physical vigor from a more bracing climate. During his six years' labor in the State he has made a record for pastoral faithfulness and has labored for public reforms, making his influence felt outside the church.

THE WEST.

Iowa.

PERRY.—Union services led by Evangelist Cordner are meeting with remarkable success. During the first week there were about 200 professions of conversion. At a Sunday afternoon meeting for men there were about 1,500 in attendance, many of them railroad men. The meetings are held in a large tabernacle seating over 2,000 persons. They are crowded every evening. On a certain date the stores are all requested to close for the meetings.

MADISON COUNTY.—First. The efforts of the pastor, Rev. E. J. B. Salter, are greatly appreciated by his people. He is being visited by Rev. H. H. Moore of Ohio, who has been preaching in the church and holding special services in neighboring schoolhouses and towns with good congregations.

BUFFALO CENTER.—On a recent Sunday the church received 31 persons to membership, the first fruits of special services conducted by Evangelists Cordner and Packard. Mr. Packard is called to this pastorate and he resigns his position as home missionary evangelist to accept.

CEDAR RAPIDS.—Bethany. Mr. J. B. Gonzales, who has supplied the church for the past year, was ordained by council June 24.——First. Rev. G. R. Dickinson, D. D., has closed his pastorate here. It is his purpose to spend some time in postgraduate work at Andover.

GRINNELL.—An effort is being made to raise the amount of the church indebtedness before the end of the year. The debt is about $1,800 and more than half of the amount has been already subscribed. The C. E Society is aiding the cause.

ALTON.—The pastor, Rev. G. H. Cooley, for some months past has been holding an afternoon service at Granville, a town of 600 inhabitants where there is no Protestant church. An organization is to be formed at an early date.

SARGEANT'S BLUFFS.—Rev. John Gray, who was obliged to give up his work here to take a rest, has returned again to Iowa, after a winter spent in California. He is ready to take up active work as a pastor.

The pastor in Prairie City, Rev. J. J. Mitchell, and family will camp two weeks at the Midland Chautauqua.

Minnesota.

EXCELSIOR—At the ordination of the new pastor in this church, which is the second church of its order formed in the State, Rev. G. R. Merrill, D. D., pastor of the first church formed in Minnesota, was moderator. The church has been discouraged by the incoming of another denomination, but is greatly inspired by the labors of the new pastor. Recently the young people provided for painting the house. A large attendance of ministers and delegates from the neighboring churches at the council was full of inspiration to the church. A collation was served between sessions with large attendance of the townspeople.

BRAINERD.—First. Rev. T. M. Edmands has commenced his third year with this church, during which time much financial progress has been made. A series of meetings recently held with assistance from abroad developed added interest. The large debt to the C. C. B. S. is being slowly paid.——Second. By the coming of a new pastor the little church has taken new life. Congregations crowding the capacity of the church and a growing Sunday school are reported. Improvements in this end of town are helping the church.

WADENA.—Large advance has been made along all lines since the coming of Rev. J. H. B. Smith. A subscription of $1,400 to be increased to $2,000 has been raised for the purpose of remodeling and enlarging the church building. The seating capacity will be doubled and the building raised. The church is rapidly developing into a strong, aggressive organization. The pastor's wife, Mrs. Esther Smith, is preaching at Park Rapids, where the church is greatly encouraged and is improving along all lines.

Nebraska.

OGALALLA.—The effort of this church to repair and renovate its house of worship recently received substantial aid of a novel character. The pastor, Rev. W. S. Hampton, was of assistance years ago to Dr. W. E. Barton of Boston, when the latter was commencing his studies, and the friendship of those early days has continued. At the suggestion of Dr. Barton, Shawmut Church, Boston, gave the last $125 toward the work of repair at Ogalalla. The church has been repainted without, the tower repaired, and the inside neatly papered and decorated.

OMAHA.—Pilgrim. The three months of service of Mrs. L. P. Byles with this church have resulted in much good. The financial affairs were systematically arranged so that monthly payments were made on the salary, a sufficient amount was raised to purchase a commodious school building in the neighborhood, and nearly enough to defray the expense of its removal when a permanent location has been secured. Six persons also united with the church during the three months.

LINCOLN.—First and Plymouth. Both these churches observed Children's Day and a collection was taken by the former for the mission Sunday schools. Both churches have ascertained their liabilities to the end of the year in advance and determined upon plans to meet the same. Both have an excellent prospect of closing the year without a shortage.

GENEVA.—The pastor, Rev. P. H. Hines, has been called to preach several memorial sermons of late, one each before the United Workmen, the Grand Army and the Knights of Pythias.

PACIFIC COAST.

California.

BENICIA.—First. The program of the 30th anniversary was divided into three parts, according to the number of days which the sessions occupied. The days were occupied with thoughts of New and Old. Letters from former pastors and absent members were read, and pleasant reminiscences also enjoyed. Rev. S. M. Freeland of Oakland preached a scholarly sermon, and later these topics were considered: Far and Near, Woman's Work, The Mission of Congregationalism to the Community and State, What Our Church Stands For, and Work and Worship. The Sunday morning sermon was preached by Dr. S. H. Willey, for nearly 10 years pastor here formerly. During the 25 years' work of the Ladies' Social Circle nearly $12,000 have been raised. The presence of a number of past members and friends during the three days' celebration helped to make the sessions profitable and interesting, but success was largely due to the plans and effective service of the pastor, Rev. Samuel Weyler.

Rev. L. J. Garver, Grass Valley, was given a surprise by his people upon the anniversary of his 34th birthday.——Rev. Josiah Sims has just celebrated the 23d anniversary of his pastorate at Nevada City. ——Dr. McLean, Professor Nash and Rev. G. B. Hatch of Berkeley are spending the summer in the Sacramento cañon.——Professor Foster is building a house near the seminary.——Rev. L. H. Hallock, D. D., formerly of Tacoma, is supplying Third Church, San Francisco, during Rev William Rader's visit to the East.——Professor Foster is about to take charge of the West Oakland church in connection with his seminary duties. One or more of the students are to assist him.

Part of the expense for the care of a motherless child in the town is borne by the C. E. Society of the First Church, Bellows Falls, Vt. This society is carrying on a Sunday school and a Junior society four miles from the town.

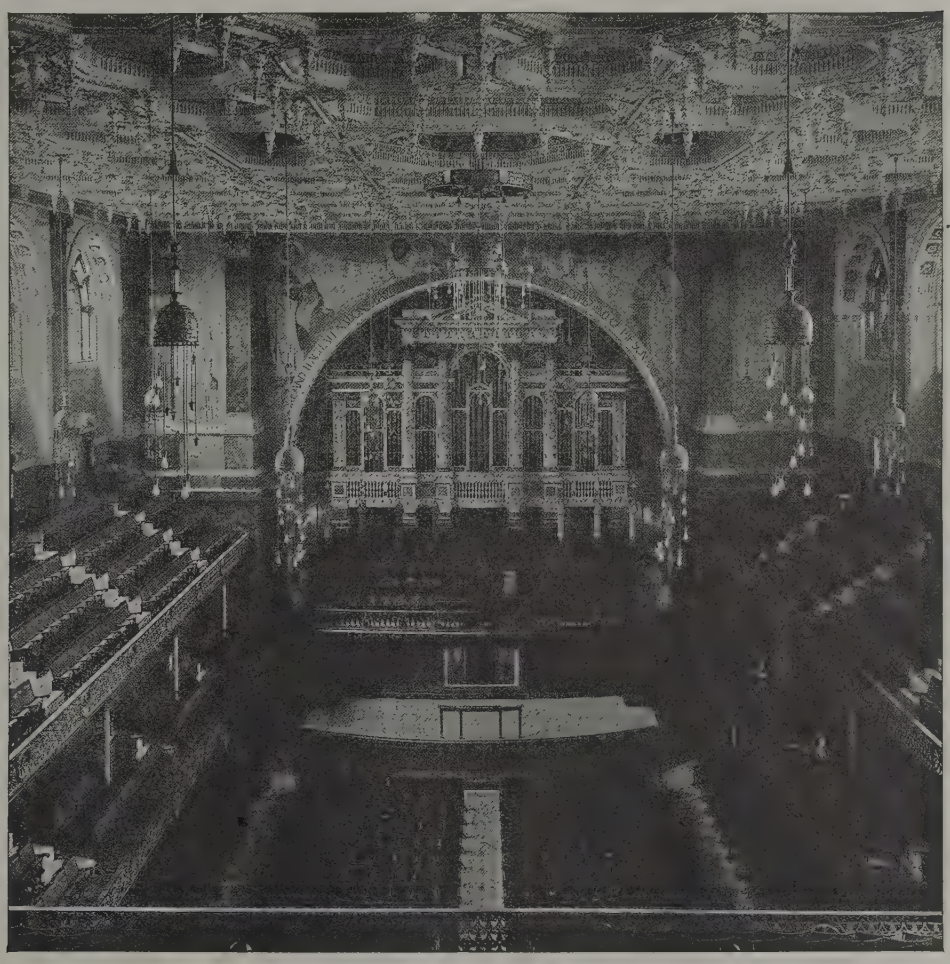
International Sunday School Convention.

Triennial Rally of Teachers, Superintendents and Other Workers for the Young.

TIMES AND PLACES.

Had the 1,050 delegates to the Sunday School Convention arrived in Boston one day earlier there would have been danger of 1,050 sunstrokes. As it was, either through the controlling foresight of the entertainment committee or the kindly inclinations of the east wind, the mercury dropped far below the boiling point just as the first day's session began. Consequently the results of the gathering were at least double those of the usual moist and drowsy summer convention. The audiences were wide-awake, responsive and full of enthusiasm. Every hour of every day counted for the cause.

The gorgeous new Tremont Temple, stately without and sumptuous within, was a scene of ceaseless activity from early morning until late at night. The old Park Street Church near by was daily thronged at the noon hour while Mr. Moody preached, and both buildings were conspicuously decorated for the occasion. The interior of Tremont Temple, when crowded to the roof with a vast audience, was a splendid spectacle. The two high galleries draped in red, white and blue, the tall pilasters of shining, mottled marble, the profusion of rich gilding, the brightly colored maps hung along the walls, the glittering organ in its vaulted arch of white and gold, the ten stained glass prophets looking down from the hights above and the immense flat ceiling, paneled and rosetted and studded with a thousand incrusted pendants, all as white as coral, with here and there a gleam of gold, and dropping down a score of magnificently gilded chandeliers—put all this together, add a world of enthusiasm and you have the whole effect.



INTERIOR OF TREMONT TEMPLE.

THE PRESS.

Certainly there is no city in America where the daily newspapers are more responsive to occasions of religious importance than they are in Boston. Mr. Moody has more than once had to subsidize Chicago dailies to get space at all, but in Boston he found himself reported at length, with portrait and with considerable sympathetic comment—and all gratuitously. For two days the convention commanded a good portion of the first page in nearly every paper. Only on Thursday was it crowded into the rear, and then only because of the Corbett fight and the Cornell boat race, events which newspaper men seem to consider of vastly greater national import. Owing to the shrewd and careful management of the press committee, digests of the most valuable reports submitted were given to the papers in printed form, which avoided all the usual errors and inaccuracies. Perhaps, too, the splendid acoustic properties of Tremont Temple had something to do with the precision of the reporting. Every word spoken is distinctly heard even in the farthest corners of the building. Illustrations were abundant and uniformly good. There was nothing to remind one of the wise saying that "it is wonderful how big a man feels when he learns that his portrait is to be published, and how small he feels when he sees it in the paper."

THE SPIRIT OF THE CONVENTION.

Dr. Parkhurst once began an address at a great mass meeting by saying, "I take it we have come together, not to amuse one another but because we have business on hand." This expresses precisely the spirit of the Sunday School Convention. All told—commanderate, rank and file and camp followers—there were at least 3,000 visitors in Boston, and yet their presence was not remarkably conspicuous. They had business on hand, and sight-seeing was a matter of secondary or tertiary importance. Even the Public Library escaped being sacked by the crowds.

The meetings were thoroughly businesslike, but at the same time thoroughly religious and thoroughly enthusiastic. The main object was to learn, and the serious-minded delegates—they were all serious-minded—gave themselves wholly to storing up knowledge. The papers and addresses were meaty, practical and suggestive. They contained more fact than fancy, more sense than sentiment and more concrete reality than abstract theory.

All were alike impressed with the significance of the occasion. A committee was to be elected to choose lessons for 12,000,000 children to study. Methods were to be designed that would affect the morality and the spirituality of a generation. A work was in hand upon whose success depend in large measure the safety of the nation and the continuity of Christian faith. Consequently the spirit of the gathering was truly devout and prayerful.

Brotherliness reigned. Distant States shook hands across the aisle, rival States sang Psalms together, and the two nations that glared at each other last December met in perfect friendliness, while the flags of Great Britain and the United States hung side by side.

FAMILIAR FACES.

Not one of the many speakers was more constantly in evidence than Mr. Moody. Each morning he conducted a devotional service, and at noon addressed another immense audience. He pleaded for prayerfulness and for a recognition and a reception of the gift of the Holy Ghost. Mr. B. F. Jacobs, chairman of the executive committee, cracked jokes, led the applause, encouraged the singing and contributed generously to the general good feeling. He is a born leader who has trained his talent for leadership. Dr. Lorimer, at home in Tremont Temple, was the most stirring orator of the convention. His address of welcome was a triumph. Hon. Samuel B. Capen, chosen president of the gathering, was —as always—modest, earnest and impressive, a noble representative of the Christian merchants of Boston. Dr. David J. Burrell of New York city spoke but once, yet to good effect, and Dr. A. F. Schauffler made a single address speak volumes of good humor and good sense. Dr. Nehemiah Boynton, formerly of Boston and now of Detroit, was incisive and effective. No speaker got a more cordial reception than Hon. John Wanamaker.

The music was excellent. A precentor who looked singularly like the late Lord Leighton led the congregational singing, with the assistance of Mr. Jacobs. That gentleman insisted upon more and more noise, and after much wheedling, threatening and flattery he succeeded in getting it. When the great throng had once been made to sing, its splendid volume of sound was only equalled by that of the immense organ. Among the most popular soloists were the composer, M. Stebbins, and the boy soprano, Garfield Stone.

MR. MOODY.

While there were many who looked upon the convention mainly as an occasion of practical interest and opportunity, Mr. Moody thought of it chiefly as a great gathering of Christian leaders who might be fired anew with religious fervor. Although the Northfield convention was close at hand, the untiring evangelist never spared himself the strain of speaking or the taxing exhaustion of personal dealing with individuals. He had the same magnetic power that never leaves him, the same direct address, based upon Scripture and upon Scripture alone, that never fails to convince and to impress. Immense audiences assembled to hear him. When he spoke in Park Street Church the house was packed long before the service began. When his address was announced as following the morning session in Tremont Temple, not a delegate left the auditorium. A vigorous attempt was made to have the morning devotional service begin thirty minutes earlier, so as to give Mr. Moody more time, and the suggestion was a failure only because so many delegates were lodged at a great distance from Tremont Temple and could not possibly attend at the earlier hour. Mr. Moody's work was thoroughly appreciated and those who came only to enjoy a Boston convention feel that they have had a taste of Northfield as well. Nothing during all four days' sessions was more deeply impressive than the great congregation in Tremont Temple standing, at Mr. Moody's request, and reciting together the Twenty-third Psalm.

THE LESSON COMMITTEE: ITS WORK AND ITS BACKING.

The report of the lesson committee was presented by Rev. Warren Randolph, D. D., its secretary. The retiring committee has met nine times since its election in 1890—twice in New York, once in Washington, twice in St. Louis, once in Philadelphia, once in Montreal and twice in Boston. According to the Sunday-School Journal, the uniform international lessons are now taught under the auspices of the Methodist Episcopal Church in nearly twenty different languages throughout the world, and in nine different languages in the United States. The report continued at considerable length, showing the wide acceptance the lessons had won and the loyalty—especially in the queen's dominions—that the committee could rely upon. Such a full statement implied, doubtless unintentionally, that the committee had felt the criticisms passed upon it. Dr. Burrell, who is unreservedly a supporter of the international lessons, spoke very pointedly of the various charges that have been preferred against the system. To those who would have nearly all the instruction in the life of Christ he answered that "the man who gets his portrait of Christ from the gospels alone loses the whole force of the Messianic argument." He insisted that the Old Testament was to be taught entire, because Christ quoted it freely, and he had no patience with those who greatly preferred the New Testament for Sunday school study. To the many who think certain portions of Scripture unprofitable he said, "All Scripture given by inspiration of God is profitable." In reply to the objection raised against the "hop-skip-and-jump" method of study and the plea for a continuous and uninterrupted course of lessons, he said the Bible was a big book, and that it was better to sample it at many points than try to learn it more intelligently at any one. The convention, as in former years, stands committed to the international system.

SILVER AND GOLD.

Mr. Jacobs, according to one of the dailies, conducted "a service of pledges." Surely the expression was a fit one, for if ever the proceedings of a Christian assemblage deserved to be called a service, the deliberations of Thursday morning did. Mr. Jacobs called the roll of all the States, Territories and Provinces, and the delegates shouted back the amount their respective States, Territories and Provinces could give to the cause of organized Sunday school work. A round of applause greeted every pledge, and Mr. Jacobs's jocose comments kept the meeting in fine spirits. All the pledges were for annual contributions for each of three years. Although twenty-one States, etc., were not yet heard from, the pledges from the remaining districts amounted to $8,580. Additional pledges from individuals amounted to $2,861. Various publishing houses and unions promised $583.33. The total amount thus far subscribed is $12,024.33. The organization will be richer by $2,300 when the people who subscribed that amount at St. Louis three years ago find it in their hearts, or perhaps it might be said more justly in their purses, to pay up.

PRIMARY WORK.

That the leaders of organized Sunday school work believe in "getting close to the cradle" and in doing so intelligently was abundantly evidenced by two programs, carried out simultaneously, one in Tremont Temple and the other in Lorimer Hall. An entire afternoon was devoted to the subject. A valuable series of papers was presented. Patterson Du Boise discussed The Primary Principle, Margaret C. Brown spoke on Child Study, a Vital Issue in Froebel's Philosophy, Mrs. J. W. Barnes reported The Work of the Primary Union, Mrs. W. F. Crafts read a paper on The International Primary Union, and The Kindergarten of the Church was treated by Mary Chisholm Foster. This was in Tremont Temple. Down stairs The Primary Session was discussed by Israel P. Black and Primary Appliances by Juliet Dimock Dudley. A paper on The Primary Teacher as a Shepherd was read by Annie S. Harlow, another on The Graded Primary Department by Mabel Hall, and a third on Reviews and Reviews by Anna Johnson Semelroth. The concluding address was by Mrs. M. G. Kennedy, who asked and answered the question, After the Primary Class, What?

THE LOWER HALLS.

Only the upper part of the building known as Tremont Temple properly bears that name. That is the great auditorium. Down below are Lorimer Hall and Gilbert Hall. The former was used for gatherings to listen to reports from the field, to discuss methods and to perfect organization. In this way two series of meetings were carried on at once, so twice as much ground was covered by the discussions, though in consequence no one person could attend all the deliberations of the convention. This difficulty was largely alleviated by the thorough work of the press committee, who made all the material in hand available for every one.

In Gilbert Hall there was a little world's fair, exhibiting all conceivable kinds of Sunday school appliances—maps, relief maps, blackboards and blackboard contrivances, placards with Commandments, Psalms, Beatitudes, hymns and so on. Among the books on show the H. L. Hastings Anti-Infidel Library was well to the front. Hymn-books were piled up in tottering towers, and library books, Sunday school papers, lesson helps and the like were loaded upon the tables, while samples of the same were loaded into the arms of any visitor who showed the slightest interest in anything. The whole affair was a pretty sight. It looked not unlike a big church fair, with the same crowd, the same urgent venders of wares, the same warm air from artificial lights and the same hum of voices. Fortunately, however, the prices were well within the bounds of reason, and one could even go away without making a purchase and not think of himself as a heathen.

SOME VALUABLE STATISTICS.

Mr. Jacobs's long and full report contained the following statistics, which embody a cursory history of Sunday school work since 1875 and a condensed statement of the condition of things in the Sunday school world today. There is much to be learned from a study of these statistics. New York is first in membership and first in numbers gained; Iowa is first in the number of schools gained; Oklahoma is first in the percentage gained; Pennsylvania is second in membership; Missouri is second in the number of schools gained, and second in membership gains; British Columbia is second in percentage gained; Ohio is third in membership; California is reported third in schools gained; Wisconsin is reported third in membership gains.

THE NEW LESSON COMMITTEE.

The new lesson committee chosen to prepare the International Lessons for the next term of years is:

Rhode Island—Warren Randolph, D D., Baptist; Illinois—Mr. B. F. Jacobs, Baptist; New York—A. F. Schauffler, D. D., Presbyterian; Massachusetts—A. E. Dunning, D. D., Congregational; Maryland—E. B. Kephart, D. D., United Brethren; Tennessee—Mr. John R. Pepper, Methodist; Kentucky—Prof. John

R. Sampey, D.D., Baptist; Missouri—Mosheim Rhodes, D.D., Lutheran; Ontario—John Potts, D.D., Methodist; Pennsylvania—J. S. Stahr, D.D., Reformed; Tennessee—Prof. J. I. D. Hinds, Ph. D., Presbyterian; New York—B. B. Tyler, D.D., Christian; Colorado—H. W. Warren, D.D., Methodist; Virginia—Prof. W. W. Moore, D.D., Presbyterian; Quebec—Prin. E. I. Rexford, B.A., Protestant Episcopal.

As has long been customary, the committee will choose their own officers.

OF PASSING INTEREST.

Great emphasis was put by various speakers upon the necessity of denominational co-operation.

The support of the general work under the direction of the International Committee costs $25,000 a year.

Mr. Jacobs's joke about his talent for getting lost in Boston got its full share of applause. The delegates all appreciated the situation.

The transportation committee arranged excursions to Plymouth, Old Orchard Beach, the White Mountains, Lake Winnepesaukee, Lexington and Concord.

Almost without exception the speakers were on hand to fulfill their engagements. As is rarely the case at a great convention the program was carried out substantially as printed.

An effort is being made to bring primary teaching into line with modern pedagogic methods by establishing lending libraries of books on child study for circulation among primary teachers.

Daily issues of the International Evangel were distributed free of charge during the convention. The paper faithfully reported the addresses and gave excellent half-tone portraits of prominent speakers.

Juliet Dimock Dudley is an advocate of the sand map. She uses it effectively in primary classes, junior societies, mission bands and in all departments of work among children. She showed how by changing the nomenclature the map could be made to illustrate a wide range of topics.

At the urgent request of Mr. Henry Chase, agent of the New England Watch and Ward Society, especial mention was made of the introduction of immoral publications into the public schools, and the members of the convention were entreated to use all means available for their suppression.

Margaret C. Brown of New York is an earnest advocate of child study and its application to the Sunday school. She would introduce the same methods of psychological investigation that have produced the kindergarten and assured its success by basing it upon scientific principles.

Marion Lawrence of Ohio is a modest man. He told the audience that the best thing would be to omit his paper. A voice from the gallery cried out, "It will never be the best thing for any convention in the United States to fail to hear Marion Lawrence," whereupon Mr. Lawrence proceeded.

Dr. Schauffler believes in the study of the Bible "in spots" historically. He said that any one who would go in deep at one spot would want to go in deep at other spots. He showed that the way to pick out the most important spots was to look for points where miracles multiply and the narrative expands. He recommended the use of such books as J. Munro Gibson's Ages Before Moses and The Mosaic Era, White's Christ in the Tabernacle, William M. Taylor's Elijah the Prophet and Stalker's lives of Christ and Paul.

SOME POSITIONS TAKEN.

Blessed be the man that writes a small book.—Rev. A. F. Schauffler, D.D.

Let us ask, let us seek, let us knock, and let us expect great things.—D. L. Moody.

I do not believe that any teacher has a right to come before any class with a lesson help of any kind.—Rev. G. C. Lorimer, D.D.

As an evangelizing agency and a practical method of work house to house visitation is growing both in popularity and effectiveness. —William Reynolds.

In order that improved methods be made known to the schools and workers, it is necessary that a complete chain of organization be maintained from the international committee to the individual teacher.—William Reynolds.

Dr. Sarah Hackett Stevenson tells us that the childhood of this generation is crying out, "Educate my mother!" If transposed to read, "Educate my teacher," it will voice the heart and life cry of many children who do not yet know of their great need and how to ask for it.—B. F. Jacobs.

We cannot afford to omit the temperance question, and we urge upon the teachers of all our Sunday schools the importance of teaching and training our children and youth to be firm and consistent temperance men and women, and to be haters of the abominable traffic in every form.—B. F. Jacobs.

Fellow-teachers, let us never forget in all our work that our words will never go any further than own lives will carry them. Back of the teacher and the teaching is the man himself, and not what we say but what we are will determine the force of our message. Emerson's words are forever true: "What you are speaks so loud I cannot hear what you say."—Hon. S. B. Capen.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR NOTES.

Some Kentucky Juniors fold up small pieces of paper on which are fitting Bible verses and distribute them like powders among the sick, with the time indicated when they are to be read.

The first National Convention of Mexican C. E. Societies was held June 5-7 in the quaint old city of Zacatecas. Delegates came from various parts of this country of immense distances, where the societies are scattered from Texas to Yucatan and from Vera Cruz to Sonora, and, though but one or two of the whole number had ever attended such a gathering, the usual features of a C. E. convention were as successful in Mexico as in the United States. Some Endeavorers rode five days on horseback through the blistering heat in order to be present, and two walked from Guadalajara, 150 miles distant. Dr. and Mrs. Clark attended and spoke inspiring words. The sunrise prayer meeting and revival service, led by the pastor-evangelist, Señor Morales, were particularly impressive, and the eloquent address of a young Mexican on the Christian Endeavorer as a Citizen met with loud applause. The reports showed a gain of thirty-four Senior and six Junior Societies, making a total of fifty-seven C. E. organizations in Mexico.

THAT AWFUL COUGH.—In thousands of homes there is pain and sorrow over one who is racked and shaken by a rasping graveyard cough. If some friendly hint would only lead them to try Adamson's Botanic Cough Balsam, all would be gladness. Sold at all druggists.

NEVER FELT BETTER.—Roxbury, Mass., April 23, 1896. "I began taking Hood's Sarsaparilla in 1890, and I have used eight bottles with good effect, and I never felt better in my life. Two months ago my wife began taking Hood's Sarsaparilla and she is improving. I believe that every one who gives it a good trial will find it a perfect blood purifier." Benjamin J. Brooks, 4 Roxbury Terrace.

HOOD'S PILLS cure all liver ills.

SWEET SLEEP

"Sweet sleep," restoring the exhausted powers of nature, renewing, energizing, building up, cannot be had when the blood is impure, the circulation sluggish, the nerves and organs improperly nourished. Sweet sleep comes by taking Hood's Sarsaparilla, which, by purifying the blood, invigorates the system and restores and quiets the nerves. Remember

HOOD'S Sarsaparilla

Hood's Pills are the only pills to take with Hood's Sarsaparilla.

1835-1896.

It was a rush-seat chair like this that probably adorned your great-grandmother's parlor three generations ago. It was a seat like this that you first became familiar with in early childhood days.

It is quite possible that your great-grandmother may have bought her chairs of us in 1835. It is fitting that you should trade of the same house that she traded with. Not often is this possible in our day of American history.

You will recognize the historic shape of this old chair the instant that you see it. The seat is exceedingly comfortable, the center being slightly depressed. The frame shapes in to the recess of the back, and bends outward at the shoulders with a broad support across the top.

Think of the chance which we offer you this season of securing chairs like this famous pattern at the cost of ordinary bedroom chairs. This is what our Antique Revival has made possible.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

The situation as a whole is promising. The strong Eastern wing of the Democracy, under the able leadership of William C. Whitney, is preparing to make a determined battle for the gold standard at the Chicago convention next week. If the gold men suffer defeat there it will not be unexpected, but if they succeed in frustrating the schemes of the free-silverites and win the victory for sound money the currency question will be settled then and there.

It would be pleasant to have this question settled at the Chicago convention in favor of sound money, for then confidence would grow apace, trade would revive and not lag until the elections. It can be stated, however, that, while there is much uncertainty, the business interests of the country are more reassured and are confident of the ultimate triumph of sound money and the national honor.

We discuss the political situation at some length because it is the dominating factor. It is between seasons now and the general merchandise movement is light in consequence. During the first part of July traveling salesmen will start out upon the road, and not until their orders or mail advices begin to come in will it be possible to form much of an estimate of the extent of the fall trade.

It is probable that there will be a general shutting down of New England cotton mills through parts of July and August, owing to a heavy surplus of goods on hand. The mills will be run perhaps three days a week in order to prevent the help from becoming scattered. There is no improvement in the woolen situation and iron and steel suffer from the general depression. The stock markets reflect the uncertainties which harass men's minds, although as yet there has been no serious liquidation by holders of good securities.

A Lesson from Africa.—Sometimes valuable information about ourselves comes from unexpected sources. Here is something interesting about American baking powders all the way from Africa.

Rev. Bishop William Taylor, for several years Methodist Bishop of Africa, says that the red label of the Royal Baking Powder, so familiar to every housekeeper in America, is quite as well known and the powder as highly prized in every part of that continent to which civilization has extended. The Royal Baking Powder was taken to South Africa a great many years ago by Mrs. Robinson, a missionary. But its use soon spread beyond the missions, and it came to be regarded as a necessity by all classes. It was found particularly valuable in the mines and upon the ranches, and frequently sold at interior stations for a dollar a pound. Especially has it conduced to the comfort and health of the missionaries, who would find bread making a sorry business without it. Another interesting fact is that no other baking powder will stand service in that country. Rev. Ross Taylor, the agent for African missions, says: "During the past ten years we have shipped Royal Baking Powder regularly to our African missions, and for the last four years to the exclusion of all other brands, because of the testimony of our missionaries that it maintains its strength, freshness and purity in the tropical climate, which others do not. For instance, the superintendent of our mission in Angola, a work that is financially maintained on commercial lines, reported that he could not hold his trade with anything else but the Royal. We are using it in forty mission stations in Africa." Here is a suggestive fact of value to American housekeepers. Though the presence of this keeping quality in the Royal and the lack of it in other powders is developed more conspicuously in the hot, moist climate of Africa, it exists in the Royal and is deficient in the others as they are sold in this country in exactly the same ratio. This natural test demonstrates more forcibly than a chemical analysis could the wide difference that exists between the different baking powders in their combination and actual practical value. The maintenance of its strength and freshness under all climatic conditions is evidence that the Royal Powder is more accurately made and composed of purer and better ingredients. Such a powder only will give uniform results in perfect foods and prove of the greatest economy in the saving of flour, butter and other articles used in their production.—New York Christian Advocate.

COMMENCEMENT AT WELLESLEY.

Wellesley College has reached her twenty-first birthday and, as President Irvine playfully remarked at the Commencement dinner, "She should have all the proper feelings of a young voter." Certainly she has been fast outgrowing all her accommodations for the last few years and it is no wonder that during Commencement week congratulations were exchanged on every side in view of the new chapel which will begin to rise this summer on the tree-covered knoll opposite College Hall, the gift of the late Mr. W. S. Houghton, through his son and daughter. The baccalaureate sermon this year was preached by Rev. Henry van Dyke, D. D., on the text, "Freely ye have received, freely give," his theme being The Social Inequalities of Humanity. Prof. Albert Bushnell Hart of Harvard delivered the Commencement address on The True American, denouncing the false patriotism which takes pride in armies and battles, in rallies and calls to defend our country and showing the need of implanting the true patriotism which is a love for great ideals. He asserted that this love of patriotism ought to grow where right principles are inculcated, and thus are our women's colleges especially favorable for its nurture. The class of 1896, which consists of 117 members, has broken the record in one respect, as it is the first in the history of the college to finish the four years' course without having a single member suspended after the final examinations for insufficient work. Mrs. Mary B. Claflin, one of the trustees of the college, has died during the year and Mrs. J. C. Whitin of Whitinsville is the new member of the board.

As one reviews Wellesley's twenty-one years of existence, the fact that its number of students has nearly reached 1,000 speaks for itself, and one is impressed with its growth in other directions for it has gone beyond the lines of denomination, beyond the old limits of education, beyond the conservative lines of work and its future is limited only by the ability of the college to meet its financial demands.

COMMENCEMENT AT OBERLIN.

Commencement week has been an eventful one and some of its events withal have been surprises. Five years ago Professor Ballantine, after an exceptionally brilliant career as a teacher of Hebrew, was elected to the presidency of the college. At the trustee meeting on Monday of Commencement week he surprised many by tendering his resignation and insisting upon its acceptance. The trustees consequently accepted it, but strenuously urged him to resume professorial work in some department of the institution and voted him a year of absence with salary for study or travel abroad in case he should accept their invitation. He will probably in any case go abroad next year, since he has taken no leave of absence during the eighteen years of his connection with the institution. If he decides to resume professorial work at the end of the year, no theological student who ever enjoyed the privilege of being his pupil can regret that the work of the administrator has been exchanged for the higher work of the teacher.

On Sunday the baccalaureate sermon was preached by President Ballantine upon The Appeal of History to Young Americans, and in the evening an eloquent missionary address was delivered by Rev. H. T. Bliss of India. The Commencement oration was delivered by Dr. Lyman Abbott June 24, and was enthusiastically received. Its theme, presented with the speaker's usual lucid simplicity, was Human Brotherhood, applied to the church, the State, and international relationships. In the department of philosophy and the arts seventy-one received the bachelor's degree, seven graduated from the conservatory of music and seven from the course in physical training for women. The graduates from all departments except the academy were ninety-four in number.

After the Commencement exercises the alumni dinner was served to nearly 700, and was followed by unusually interesting speeches, the most impressive being by President Ballantine, who spoke hopefully about the future of the college, and Prof. James Monroe, who, in his seventy-fourth year, now retires from active service, respected and tenderly loved by students, faculty and townspeople. His connection with the college began fifty-two years ago, but has been interrupted by more than twenty years of public life in Congress and the diplomatic service. In the evening of Commencement Day the Musical Union of 175 voices rendered Saint-Saens's Samson and Delilah. Among the other events of the week was the Senior academy class exhibition June 20

EDUCATION.

— The historic "old brick academy" on Andover Hill, built in 1818, Charles Bulfinch, architect, was burned, June 22, a student occupying it narrowly escaping death. It had for many years served as a gymnasium.

— Rev. J. R. Silcox of Chicago delivered the address at Ridgeville College Commencement June 17. There were eight graduates in the minor departments. A summer school connected with the college has been opened by Prof. George Hindley and Superintendent Denney.

— Iberia Academy, Missouri, has closed a year of prosperity and growth, graduating four from the English department. Dr. J. H. George of St. Louis gave the address before the societies, and a more informal address by the home missionary superintendent, Rev. A. K. Wray, was greatly enjoyed. The growth of the classes and pressure of work on the three regular teachers make necessary the services of another teacher, whom the trustees purpose to add this fall.

— Chadron Academy, Nebraska, had its Commencement week June 7-11. The baccalaureate sermon was by Rev. A. E. Ricker of Chadron, and the address to the Graduating Class by Rev. H. V. Rominger of Hot Springs, S. D. During seven years the academy has graduated forty-six students and now has fifty pupils. The class just graduating numbers ten. The good work done here by instructors and pupils is one of the encouraging features of Christian education on the Western frontier.

— The Connecticut Valley Chautauqua Assembly, at Laurel Park, Northampton, Mass., July 14-24, offers an attractive program. The department of instruction includes class work in music, physical culture and elocution, Biblical study, Sunday school normal instruction, W. C. T. U. methods, etc., while special days, such as National Day, G. A. R. Day, Temperance Day and Young People's Day, afford opportunity for special music and lectures. Programs may be obtained from Rev. A. C. Hodges of Buckland, Mass.

— At Berea the baccalaureate sermon was preached by Rev. C. W. Mead of New York, and the address before the literary societies was given by Col. J. M. Ashley of Toledo on Reminiscences of Lincoln. Commencement day, June 24, found the usual great crowd thronging the grounds and tabernacle, and the afternoon addresses were given by Dr. W. E. Barton of Boston and Prof. H. M. Penniman, followed by Prof. J. A. R. Rogers and Hon. John D. Harris. The endowment fund is increasing and the tone of the work is hopeful. Five students graduated this year.

— Olivet College at its thirty-seventh Commencement, June 18, graduated twenty-one. The Senior preparatory class numbered thirty-three. President Sperry gave the baccalaureate on Christ's work in redeeming individuals and society. The missionary address was by the new pastor, Rev. J. A. Blaisdell. The address before the alumni was given by Rev. Dr. D. S. Clark of Salem on The School and Patriotism. A surprise to visitors was the remarkably high character of the rendering of The Creation by the conservatory chorus and concert on Commencement night.

— Commencement exercises at Whitman began with an alumni banquet at which about forty persons, including the alumni and their guests, sat at the tables. Among the toasts was one to Our Benefactor, the response to which by A. H. Reynolds would have interested all who are contributing to aid in securing Dr. Pearsons's gift. The baccalaureate sermon was preached by Rev. William Davies of Spokane, one of the Yale-Washington Band. At the meeting of the trustees, on the recommendation of the faculty, the degree of LL. D. was conferred upon D. K. Pearsons of Chicago.

— Monticello Seminary at Godfrey, Ill., makes steady progress. The fifty-eighth anniversary, June 9, was one of the most interesting ever celebrated. A class of nineteen graduated. Miss H. N. Haskell, the principal for many years, is still carrying forward the cherished plans that began to be realized after the fire a few years ago. The new annex building—the gift of Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Reid of Chicago, who have already been large givers to this institution—is to cost $40,000. It will be devoted largely to music. A gift of $1,200 from the estate of Miss Emma Abbott has been received, and the Graduating Class left a purse with the principal.

— The celebration of the seventieth anniversary of the founding of the old Western Reserve College in Hudson, O., was a notable feature of Commencement at Western Reserve Academy. Among the speakers at the anniversary exercises were President Thwing and Mr. Lora Case, who were present at the laying of the corner stone of the first college building in 1826. The baccalaureate sermon of the academy was by Rev. E. Bushnell, D. D., of Cleveland, and the Commencement address by President Thwing. Diplomas were given to twenty-two young men and women. The attendance during the past year has been the largest in the history of the school.

— At Middlebury College President Brainerd's baccalaureate was from Job 2: 10, and the annual address before the College Y. M. C. A. was given by Prof. F. B. Denio, '71, of Bangor Seminary, upon The Importance of Enthusiasm as a Factor in Life. One of the greatest attractions of Commencement week was the Parker and Merrill contests in declamation by members of the Freshman and Sophomore classes. The Graduating Class numbered twenty-four, of whom seven were young women. A new feature this year was the inauguration of Class Day exercises. Plans have been drawn for a new library building, but it cannot be erected at present, owing to lack of funds.

—— Knox College had signs of unusual interest at its fiftieth anniversary of the graduation of the first class. The baccalaureate was preached by Pres. C. R. Blanchard of Wheaton, son of Dr. Jonathan Blanchard, under whose presidency Knox College had graduated its first class. The address to the Seniors was by Pres. J. H. Finley. The Graduating Class numbered sixty-four. A notable feature of the day was the corporation dinner served upon the college campus at noon. A thousand people gathered about the tables under the trees and addresses were made by Dr. J. L. Withrow, Hon. J. H. Eckels, President Nash of Lombard University, and others.

—— The baccalaureate sermon at Fisk University was preached by Rev. A. F. Beard, D. D., of the A. M. A. There were nineteen young people to enter college and fifteen to graduate, swelling the number of the alumni to 325. These 325 are the product of thirty years' work among a people who, at the close of the war, did not know the alphabet. The anniversary of the theological department was observed, although there were no graduates. It enrolled this year eight new students. This department is only four years old. The missionary sermon was preached by Rev. Ira Landrith, editor of the Cumberland Presbyterian, a native Southerner, who has shown much interest in the Congregational work of the South.

—— At Tabor College six students graduated from college and seven from the Conservatory of Music. After thirty-nine years of service as president of the college and principal of the academy, President Brooks lays down part of the burden, but continues with the college as president emeritus and chairman of the board of trustees. Vice-President R. C. Hughes was chosen president. Besides teaching and the general management of the affairs of the college, President Brooks has secured 3,000 individual subscriptions to the college, amounting to $320,705. The degree of D. D. was conferred on Rev. F. E. Hopkins of Dubuque, who gave the Commencement address, and on Rev. Harmon Bross, superintendent of home missions in Nebraska.

REV. WILLIAM A. McGINLEY.

The death of Rev. William A. McGinley, which occurred at Chula Vista, Cal., May 25, removes from the church on earth one of its strong and devoted servants. It has brought a deep sorrow over the community where Mr. McGinley has labored the past year, and into the hearts of all who knew him.

After long years of service in the larger churches of the East, the health of members of the family circle led Mr. McGinley, more than a year ago, to seek a home in California. Shortly after his coming the little church at Chula Vista invited him to serve it as pastor. With that heartiness which has been so marked a characteristic of the man he took up the work in this beautiful region of orange groves, and within a few months had made himself so essential a part of the life of the community that young and old feel themselves bereft of a lifelong friend in his departure. Though his pastorate here was so short, it has given the church such an impetus as must carry it rapidly forward in the line he had planned and to which he had devoted himself. A severe attack of pneumonia was followed by weeks of severe suffering, in which Mr. McGinley bore himself with the utmost fortitude and patience. He proved in his dying all that he had preached in life about the faithfulness of the Divine Helper. "It is wonderful," he said again and again, "the grace and strength that are given me." "Underneath are the everlasting arms," was the constant text of his sickroom.

At the funeral service in the church Rev. S. A. Norton, of San Diego, spoke on behalf of the ministers of the region, and Judge Haines of Chula Vista on b'half of the people who had been blessed by Mr. McGinley's brief ministry among them, both speaking words of deep appreciation. Mr. McGinley, as the first settled pastor of the Chula Vista church, united the entire community in its support and set it far on the road toward large success. S. A. N.

DEACON MARSHALL PEASE,

Who died in Chicopee, May 13, was a man of rare Christian character, who was loved, trusted and honored by all who knew him. Throughout his entire life he was active in the Sunday school, either as pupil, teacher or superintendent; he was for many years a leader of the choir, and for thirty years deacon of the First Church in Chicopee.

Faithful in all the relations of life, he was often called to fill public office, which he did wisely and well. He was generous in his contributions to the church and to all the causes of Christian philanthropy. His death leaves a large void in the church and community.

HARRIET BEECHER STOWE.

From a photograph taken in 1868.

I AM come to that stage of my pilgrimage that is within sight of the River of Death, and I feel that now I must have all in readiness day and night for the messenger of the King. I have sometimes had in my sleep strange perceptions of a vivid spiritual life near to and with Christ, and multitudes of holy ones, and the joy of it is like no other joy—it cannot be told in the language of the world. What I have then I know with absolute certainty, yet it is so unlike and above anything we conceive of in this world that it is difficult to put it into words. The inconceivable loveliness of Christ! It seems that about him there is a sphere where the enthusiasm of love is the calm habit of the soul, that without words, without the necessity of demonstrations of affection, heart beats to heart, soul answers soul, we respond to the Infinite Love, and we feel his answer in us, and there is no need of words.—Harriet Beecher Stowe, in a letter to a friend, written in 1887.

EDUCATION.

—— The graduating class at Williams was a comparatively small one for recent years, there being but sixty-two members. It is thought that the college has probably reached the limit of its growth for some time, owing to the lack of dormitory accommodations, and future efforts will be directed toward the improvement, rather than the enlargement, of the institution.

—— Commencement at Ward Academy, South Dakota, this year completed its third year of work, and the first class of the school graduated three members in the classical course, all of whom mean to take a full college course. Addresses were given by Rev. James F. Cross of Redfield on The Demand of the Day for Higher Education, and by Rev. E. M. Williams, D. D., of Yankton on Loyalty. The academy has had a larger enrollment of pupils than ever before, and its sphere of influence is growing steadily.

—— The Commencement exercises of Temple Grove Seminary, Saratoga Springs, included an anniversary sermon by Rev. Herbert Gesner and an address by Dr. Dowd, the principal. The pupils' recital was of a high order. A lawn party was given by the principal and his wife and was attended by a large and brilliant assemblage. One of the principal features was the Class Day exercises, which proved extremely interesting and original. The alumnæ banquet was greatly enjoyed. On a later day essays were read by the members of the class.

—— Among the results of the recent financial campaign at Illinois College is the establishment of memorial scholarships by Lyman W. True of Jacksonville, in memory of his son, and by Mrs. E L. Brainerd of Lincoln, Ill., in memory of her father, Henry H. Ousley, who was closely identified with the early history of the institution. The C. E. Societies of several churches in Jacksonville and other towns have given money to establish a Christian Endeavor scholarship. Friends of the late D. W. Fairbank have endowed an alcove in the new library, which will bear his name, and it is greatly desired that other alcoves may be similarly provided for. Such an endowment requires $1,500.

—— The program of the Northern New England Chautauqua Assembly at Fryeburg, Me., July 28–Aug. 15, promises valuable courses in kindergarten, physical culture, parliamentary law, music, painting and the natural sciences in charge of an able corps of teachers, as well as numerous lectures by such popular speakers as Rev. J. J. Lewis, F. R. Roberson, Rev. E. L. Warren, Mr. E. P. Gaston and Miss C. T. Sibley, while the musical talent will, as in past years, be of a high order. Special features will be W. C. T. U. day, political day, grange day, etc. The assembly is under the direction of George D. Lindsay of Portland, Me., who has successfully managed the previous summer schools.

—— There is little danger that the young people of Boston will lose their interest in American history so long as the Old South summer lectures maintain their high standard and the Old South prizes continue to stimulate study and thought along this line. The lecture course this year, which opens July 15, has as its general subject The American Historians, and the lecturers are to be Mr. E. D. Mead, Professors Barrett Wendell and C. H. Levermore, Mr. Richard Burton, Pres. Austin Scott, Hon. Roger Wolcott, Rev. Dr. W. E. Griffis and Mr. John Fiske. Four prizes are offered for next year to graduates of the Boston High and Latin Schools in 1895 and 1896 for the best essays on two subjects—Early Historical Writing in America from Capt. John Smith to Governor Hutchinson and The Harvard Historians and the Services of Harvard University for American History.

—— Exceptionally fine music, large audiences and marked excellence of the graduating exercises were the special features of the forty-second annual Commencement of Pacific University, June 13–17. President McClelland, who had just returned from the East, gave the baccalaureate sermon on The Individual's Debt to the World, based on Rom. 1: 14–16. Sunday evening Rev. Mahlon Willett, D. D., delivered an able address before the Christian associations of the college. Then followed on succeeding evenings the address before the literary societies by Hon. C. E. S. Wood, the address to the alumni by Hon. Harvey Scott and the closing exercises of Tualatin Academy, which graduated fifteen young ladies and gentlemen. The college graduating exercises occurred June 17, followed in the evening by the best Commencement concert ever given in Forest Grove. The university thus closed one of the most successful years in its history, with the largest attendance on record.

$25.00 IN GOLD GIVEN AWAY

Who can form the greatest number of words from the letters in CONTESTANTS by using them backward or forward? You are smart enough to make fifteen or more words, we feel sure, and if you do you will receive a good reward. Do not use any letter more times than it appears in the word Here is an example of the way to work it out: Con, cost, coat, on, test, to, eat, etc. The publishers of WOMAN'S WORLD AND JENNESS MILLER MONTHLY will pay $10 in gold to the person able to make the largest list of words from the letters in the word CONTESTANTS; $6 for the second largest; $5 for the third; $3 for the fourth, and $1 to the fifth, and a lady's handsome American movement watch for each of the seven next largest lists. The above rewards are given free and without consideration for the purpose of attracting attention to our handsome and valuable ladies' magazine, twenty-four pages, ninety-six long columns, finely illustrated, and all original matter, long and short stories by the best authors; price $1 per year. It is necessary for you to send 12 two-cent stamps for a three-months' trial subscription with your list of words, and every person sending 24 cents and a list of fifteen words or more is guaranteed an extra present by return mail (in addition to the magazine) of a large 100-page book, "Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush," by Ian Maclaren, one of the most fascinating books of the age. Satisfaction guaranteed in every case or your money refunded. Lists should be sent at once, and not later than July 25, so that the names of successful contestants may be in the September issue, published in August. Our publication has been established nine years. We refer you to any mercantile agency for our standing. Write now. Address J. H. PLUMMER, Publisher, 905 Temple Court, New York City.

Cloth, pages 362, price $1.50 net.

It was not a foolish self-conceit which led Peter Parker to make provision in his will that his biography should be published under the direction of Yale University. The life was so full of interesting incident, so glowing with lofty purpose, and so brilliant in successful accomplishment that it had been a shame to leave the book unwritten. As the founder of medical missionary work in China, as the invaluable helper of the first diplomatic agents of the United States in the Celestial kingdom, as the holder of high official positions and the possessor of the highest esteem of both Chinese and Americans, Dr. Parker's record is that of a singularly useful and successful life. The story has been well woven together, and those who read it will find something of the secret of the power of the notable man whose life it records.

THE student conference at Northfield this year has been pervaded with a fine spirit of devotion, and not lacked in attendance or enthusiasm. Rev. Dr. Alexander McKenzie of Cambridge has been the most illuminating and frequent speaker. Rev. A. T. Pierson, D. D., in his peculiarly successful way, has stirred the enthusiasm of the boys and directed their thoughts toward foreign missionary work, and Superintendent Shelton of the C. H. M. S. has set forth admirably the claims of the home missionary fields. C. T. Studd and Robert Speer, typical English and American university men, who have consecrated their lives to Bible study and missionary labor, have opened up the Bible to the multitude gathered on Round Top. Athletics and rational sports, as usual, have had their place, and the Fourth of July was observed jubilantly. Mr. Moody, of course, has dominated, and shaped the thought and spirit of all speakers and hearers. Verily, Northfield during the summer months is a center of immense spiritual influences. The young women's conference begins this week.

That we have not overestimated the interest felt in England in the tour of our Pilgrims to historic shrines is abundantly proved by the English papers just coming to hand, and whose friendly comments we regret that we have not space to reprint. In every city thus far visited the secular press has chronicled with considerable minuteness the round of sight-seeing and the various public and private courtesies extended. The London Telegraph, one of the leading journals of that city, has called attention editorially to the significance of the presence in England just at this time of so representative a group of Americans. The religious papers, as might be expected, give even more space to the accounts of the festivities, and Dr. J. G. Rogers's leading editorial in the Independent and Nonconformist of June 25 points out the specific value in many directions of such manifestations of fellowship. Indeed, the pith of all the comment on the trip seems to be its bearing upon more sympathetic and helpful relations, not only between the two great nations, England and America, but between the Anglican and the Free Churches. Certainly nothing could be more beautiful and brotherly than the address of the bishop of Winchester at his own episcopal residence, where the pilgrims were so royally entertained.

We present this week some further utterances in regard to the question of "ministerial distress," which seem to show that it is not always distress in lack of opportunities of work, but of opportunities under comfortable conditions of social life, educational advantages and sufficient financial support. "The simple statement of the case is that figures and experience do not show a surplus of ministers," said Mr. Barrett, in his careful paper before the Connecticut General Association. "There is, beyond question, a surplus of applications, but that is quite another thing, and it is considerably more damaging to the cause than an actual surplus would be." In many cases, if this be true, the ambition of ministers for a larger work and a more comfortable location for their families seems to be defeating itself by cheapening the ministry and making churches more difficult to please. There are other phases of the question, but we commend this one to the thought of ministers who have been tempted to join the army of "repeaters," whose applications are always out in the direction of every desirable vacant church.

The Pan-Presbyterian Council, in session in Glasgow, has had a prosperous and harmonious meeting (after it agreed to refuse organs and use only the Psalms in praise) with interesting papers from prominent ministers, professors and laymen of the various churches in the different quarters of the world represented in the organization. The Americans have been unusually prominent and the council has been under the presidency of Dr. W. A. Roberts, the stated clerk of the Northern Presbyterian Assembly. The council resolved to petition the United States and British Governments in favor of a joint permanent arbitration tribunal. Much time was naturally given to the study of Presbyterian characteristics and attainments, and some self-gratulation may be pardoned to a denomination which can say of itself that it does "more than a quarter of the world's mission work." It was decided to hold the next council in the New York Avenue Church of Washington, D. C. As the meetings are triennial, this will occur in 1899.

"Our knowledge doth but show us our ignorance. Our most studious scrutiny is but a discovery of what we cannot know," wrote Fellthan, the English royalist. Lord Kelvin's fiftieth anniversary as professor of natural philosophy in Glasgow University has just been celebrated by the corporation of Glasgow and by 2,500 guests, in a style unexampled for its brilliancy and fervor. In a speech made during the ceremonies Lord Kelvin said:

> One word characterizes the most strenuous of the efforts for the advancement of science that I have made perseveringly during fifty-five years. That word is failure. I know no more of electric and magnetic force, or of the relation between ether, electricity and ponderable matter, or of chemical affinity, than I knew and tried to teach to my students of natural philosophy fifty years ago in my first session as professor. Something of sadness must come of failure, but in the pursuit of science inborn necessity to make the effort brings with it much of the certamînis gaudia and saves the naturalist from being wholly miserable, perhaps even allows him to be fairly happy in his daily work.

These are the words of a man who has no peer in Great Britain as a student of science and as an inventor of appliances which have added to the longevity of men and the volume of their wealth. They rebuke the conceit of men less famous but more notorious; and they reveal clearly the limitations of man if left to his own sense perceptions and reasoning.

HARRIET BEECHER STOWE.

Mrs. Stowe has been so long withdrawn from the public gaze that her death comes with less of the shock of a great personal loss than that of any of her great literary contemporaries. She has been among us, leading a quiet life, untouched by care and untroubled by perplexity, and quite as much beyond our praise as criticism.

Personally she was more interesting than many of her books. The life which began in Litchfield, Ct., when the New England country town was the center of a professional and intellectual society which is now too much concentrated in our cities, and was spent in teaching, housekeeping, child-training and literary work, with experience of country and city, East and West, was a life typical of its generation. The cares and joys of a large family circle, the experience of sorrow, the necessity of toil, the stir and enthusiasm of the new life of the West, personal contact with slavery, which existed just across a river boundary, and which broke up her father's and husband's work in Lane Seminary at last, and with the anti-slavery machinery of the "underground railway," for which her own house more than once served as a station, the quiet circle of a Maine college town, followed by the cloistered intentness of the life on Andover Hill, made her at once receptive and representative of the New England spirit.

Her claim to literary immortality rests principally upon two books, Uncle Tom's Cabin and Oldtown Folks. Dred and The Minister's Wooing belong with these as secondary products of her genius seen at its best in embodying the enthusiasm of a greatly conscientious soul, and the observation and humor of a keen and strong intellect. The rest of her literary work may be disregarded as unworthy of her powers at their best.

It would be enough to insure her fame that her best known book is forever associated with one of the great moral crises of humanity. To have quickened the conscience of a nation and of the world; to have been, after the sacred book of Christians, the most widely translated writer of all the ages; to have achieved the widest immediate recognition in the history of all literature—these constitute a sure title to remembrance. The occasion is gone by, but the book remains and helps to confirm the final verdict upon human slavery pronounced by her own generation in and after the greatest of modern wars. Uncle Tom's Cabin is still a moral force, and must be a classic for years to come. It stated in artistic form and with a great moral enthusiasm a conclusion in which the whole Christian world at last agrees.

Her pictures of New England have in a lesser degree the same power over the national imagination. We make pilgrimages to the little Massachusetts village of South Natick, not merely to see the grave of Eliot and the Eliot Oak, but also the theater in which the Oldtown Folks played their parts. Sam Lawson is very real to us, with a homely sense that he stands for the mixture of good and evil which is the foil of the other and sterner mixture in which the New England Puritan shows at his best.

Mrs. Stowe, like all writers of dramatic fiction, must be remembered by her vital characters, and that she has given us these characters, whose names and qualities have passed into current thought and speech in America, no one can doubt. The final award it is not for us who have seen her alive among us to determine, but the tribute of admiration and respect to a great soul and a useful life we may pay to her memory with grateful hearts.

SHADOW AND LIGHT.

God hides himself in light, light inexpressible and glorious, but man takes refuge for concealment in the darkness. "Thou coverest thyself with light as with a garment," is the great thought of the psalm of God presence in the natural world, and, later on, man's dependent helplessness is pictured: "Thou makest darkness and it is night, wherein all the beasts of the forest do creep forth. The young lions roar after their prey and seek their meat from God. The sun ariseth, they gather themselves together and lay them down in their dens. Man goeth forth unto his work and to his labor until the evening." Night for the ravening beasts and for man's enforced retreat to tent or house, day for his safety and his labor—how the ancient terror of darkness out of which the glaring eyes of the lions shone and their roaring sounded comes to us in the picture!

God who dwells in light made darkness. From him the lions seek their food. He puts a stop to man's activity and shuts him in to quiet and to sleep when he withdraws the light which made the world both safe and beautiful. In the contemplation of God's work there must be room for thoughts of shadow, if not in the study of his character. And in the experience of man shadow and light play in and out, following and replacing each other as the night follows the day and the dawn replaces midnight.

We have no strength of eye or heart for the eternal light, the glory which illuminates the heavenly city where night itself, in the prophetic vision, is forever at an end. For our weak sight the changing play of light and shadow make the beauty and the joy of earth. Contrast and change are essential elements of beauty, so essential that he who carves a statue must suggest motion by its repose and he who paints a picture must emphasize its brilliancy by darkness.

Countless illustrations of this law of light and shade will occur to any one whose eyes have been opened to the deeper meaning of earth's beauty. In art it is the inner secret whose powerful simplicity only the great masters fully grasp. Here is a dead wall of stone, upon which the full glare of the sunlight falls. "How ugly!" you say, "dazzling and formless as a sheet of paper held against the sun." But the artist comes. He cannot change the substance of the wall. He will not stick on ornament as a cheap cabinetmaker glues false moldings on a table. But he carves a line of ornament in deep relief and rich detail across the front at the level of the eye, he cuts a cornice of bold lines along the eaves. He makes a deep embrasured window here and there. He opens a door and makes the line of its arch deep and decisive, and the molding of its side hollow with shadowing curves. The sunlight strikes across it as before, but now the wall is beautiful, not with mere carven leaf and scroll, but with the play of light and shadow over its whole surface, like the play of light through the leaves of a tree in early spring. It is not light, but broken light which makes our satisfaction in every masterpiece of man's creative thought.

If this is true of art, in which man comes nearest to the creative work of God, it is also true of God's own workmanship in nature. The field of ripening grain lies still and beautiful in the calm noon of a summer day. But let the wind wake out of the west and stir its mellow surface with a thousand undulations of melting light and shade, and we are filled with the sense of a grace and loveliness that are beyond all words. The rain falls in dull monotony of music, and a great tree droops its far stretched boughs and dripping leaves in patient waiting with a beauty of darkness which we do not often stop to feel. But when the storm is passing, and the wind shakes the treasures of the shower from bough and twig, and the innumerable leaves are dancing for delight in the first glimpse of sunshine, showing cool depths between the emerald dark and silvery light of their rain varnished surfaces, while the drops sparkle like diamonds at their edges, light and shadow mingle in the magic dance with unimaginable beauty. The wood depths on a cloudy day are restful with their cool, mysterious shadows, the green roof overhead, the brown leaf carpet rich with tracery of fern and growth of vine and herb, loving the twilight and at home among the company of brown tree columns flecked with lichens green or gray. But what a different and more exquisite spirit of beauty haunts the sylvan ways when all the forest atmosphere is barred with slanting sunbeams and each opening among the leaves is traced in shimmering patterns on the brown wood floor.

It is not light which makes the wood so beautiful,
But light and shade.

And what is true of grain field, spreading tree and wildwood sanctuary is true of every beauty which God made on earth and, having made, thought good.

Is it not all a parable—of joy and grief, of night and day, of partial attainment and waiting opportunity, of trial and overcoming which make up the sum of life, and of the divine illumination of the shadow of the life of earth which came with Christ? He shared our weakness that he might lead us up to strength. He shared our darkness that he might bless us with his light. There is no terror in the shadow, for the God of light and beauty is our guide.

Sunlight and shadow is our life, aglow
With gleams of joy, or veiled with mists of tears.
The changing seasons follow through our years.
Out of the gloom of midnight comes the slow
Change of the dawn, the sultry noontides grow
Towards the sun's setting, and the night appears
With stars unseen by day, to calm our fears
And guide us ever in the path we go.

Lift up thy head, and know that light is thine.
In the dim way thou shalt not fear or fall.
Nearer is God, and mightier than all
Earth's powers of ill. The guiding stars that shine
Above thy path are his. Nor shalt thou call
In vain for light, since he is light divine.

CHURCH UNION AS SEEN BY POPE AND EPISCOPALIAN.

Upon one point, at least, the present pope evidently knows his own mind and is ready to speak without diplomatic vagueness. This point, it need hardly be said, is his own authority. We have quoted elsewhere from his recent encyclical letter upon this point, and may repeat here the significant sentences which must be taken as his answer to Gladstone, Lord Halifax and other Anglicans who are hoping that he may recognize the validity of English "orders." "Christ of necessity," he says, "gave to his church a supreme authority to which all Christians must be obedient. For the preservation of unity there must be unity of government jure divino, and men may be placed outside the one fold by schism as well as by heresy."

This is plain speaking, and, we should think, puts an end to the plans of church recognition, if not of church union, held by some of our Protestant Episcopal brethren. Curiously enough, they have made the same condition precedent to negotiations for church union with the Roman Church which the Presbyterians made in negotiations with them, namely, the recognition of parity, and as the Episcopalians have treated the Presbyterians, so, apparently, they are to be treated by the pope.

We have quoted in connection with the pope's letter an interesting comment by The Churchman on the action of the Presbyterian General Assembly at Saratoga in dissolving its committee on church union. The Churchman, it will be observed, distinguishes between two kinds of church union—one already existent, in which all baptized Christians already belong together, the other dependent upon something which its party in the church catholic possesses, but which the Presbyterian party lacks. By this latter it can only mean its threefold order of the ministry, instituted, as it believes, by Christ himself and monopolizing church authority from the beginning. This is the gift which it imagines that its own party has to contribute to the other and (in its definition) non episcopal party in the catholic church, lacking which its members are catholic indeed, but not "united with the Church of the apostles and prophets [big C, little a and p] whose corner stone is Christ."

This give and take argument seems to us a mere juggle of words and unworthy to stand beside the frank dogmatism of Pope Leo. We do not wonder that the Presbyterians grew weary of it. At arms' length there was always the catholic unity (of the baptized) to talk about. At close quarters there was always the apostolic succession to be asserted. Nor is this offer of a share in a magic formula of ordination particularly tempting, in view of the fact that it does not convey an undisputed title. There are enough who hold to this theory of an exclusive episcopal authority handed down from man to man, Latin, Greek, Anglican and other Christians, but the vast majority of them altogether deny the possession of it to our Anglican and Protestant Episcopalian friends.

The practical gain of this discussion as conducted by the Episcopal newspapers is the acknowledgment of the underlying unity of all baptized believers, a truth which is not new, but which The Churchman has clearly and fully stated. Here we stand on common ground with all Christians whether they will or no, because there is no question of clericalism to divide us. "Lay" baptism, if exceptional, is everywhere valid in the Christian church. Upon this ground we have often insisted that church unity already existed and that the way to make the most of it was not to discuss or quarrel over it, but to take it for granted so far as the peculiarities and prejudices of our brethren made that possible. Its full recognition will come in God's good time.

The real question which divides the Christian world is not doctrinal but ecclesiastical. It is the question whether there exists a clerical caste holding exclusive powers transmitted from the beginning, without which there may be catholic baptism but no fellowship with the apostles and prophets and with Christ himself, or whether Christ is still king in his church and all the people sharers in the priestly office. The ideal of the kingship of Christ and a universal priesthood of believers, and the ideal of a separated and self-perpetuating priestly caste with which is lodged the grace of God for the continuance of the Christian life, are essentially contradictory; and most of the corruption of the church has come out of the latter ideal and practice, in which Roman Catholics and most modern Protestant Episcopalians agree. It is something, however, for which to be thankful that The Churchman and those whom it represents agree with us that the Spirit of God works as he will in baptism, if they feel bound to hold also that he has limited himself to the services of a caste in the other offices of the catholic church.

SPECIAL TEMPTATIONS OF SUMMER.

The warm season is peculiarly accompanied by temptations to indolence and neglect of active duty. In cold weather exertion often is agreeable in itself. In summer it is apt to be distasteful. The importance of the right use of time is likely to be disregarded. Self-culture is assumed to demand too strenuous endeavor. Selfishness and forgetfulness of our obligations to others seem less offensive than at other seasons, and the line between proper enjoyment and objectionable self-indulgence becomes too easily blurred.

A common temptation is that of regarding amusement as an important object of life instead of as only a means of self-improvement and of doing good to others. So many facilities for pleasure are provided, so much attention is bestowed upon it and the desire for it is so natural that this temptation has tremendous power. But unless great care be exercised one's views of life and duty are sure to be seriously distorted, and lasting evil must result. Amusement, if rightly regulated, is harmless and necessary, but at best it is only subordinate to the claims of duty.

A kindred temptation is that to frivolity, and this besets young people especially. Their natural light-heartedness is beautiful and the gayety which it causes is charming, so long as it does not degenerate into folly. But frivolity, although closely akin to these, is disagreeable and evil and it weakens character. It is evidence of mental and moral shallowness and feebleness and it speedily becomes offensive.

To many the summer also brings peculiar temptation to ill-temper. The bodily discomfort which sometimes is experienced for several days at a time, because of the heat, is wearing to the nerves, and self-control and unvarying gentleness and kindness become difficult. But the glory of conquering one's self depends upon effort when effort is needed. Anybody can be courteous and amiable when it costs nothing. Nobody has the right to claim to be good-tempered who is not such when it is hard to be.

If the summer has its special temptations it also has its own aids to spiritual growth and happiness. Let these also be studied and appreciated.

CURRENT HISTORY.

Domestic Politics.

The situation at Chicago, as we go to press, is one of fierce strife and great uncertainty except for the definite understanding by all factions that the platform will declare unequivocally for the free coinage of silver by the United States at the ratio of sixteen to one. It needed but a few hours of mingling with the leaders and delegates from the South and West to convince the leaders and delegates from the North and East that the questions for them as opponents of silver to settle were such as these: Ought we to endeavor to secure the nomination of the least objectionable candidate to stand on a free and unlimited coinage of silver platform? Shall we refrain from participation in the proceedings, permit the majority to rule, and then either formally bolt or abstain from voting? Or shall we throw our whole weight in favor of the candidate whose record and principles are most in harmony with the platform and thus sink the ship by overloading it? Quite as much difference of opinion exists among Eastern men as to which one of these courses they should adopt as exists among the leaders of the silver faction as to the methods to be used in seeing that the convention declares the will of the majority. Moreover, the jealousies of Messrs. Bland, Boies and the other prominent candidates for the nomination and their followers are complicating the situation and adding to the bitterness of the strife. Fortunately, at the present writing, there seems to be a disposition to relegate Mr. Altgeld to the rear and prevent him from impressing upon the convention and platform those radical views which as governor of Illinois he has promulgated in State papers; but in his hostility to President Cleveland and criticism of the Administration's record he is, in a way, the spokesman for the rank and file of the party—outside the East—and Mr. Cleveland's friends will win a great tactical victory if they defeat the purpose of the Southern and Western leaders to insert in the platform a plank condemning the Administration.

The mass meeting held in the Auditorium Saturday evening, at which Mr. Franklin McVeagh of Chicago, ex-Governor William E. Russell of Massachusetts, Senator Gray of Delaware and ex-Governor Flower of New York spoke, was a significant and impressive gathering of the faction which believes that a declaration in favor of the free coinage of silver will repudiate the principles of the founders of the party and disrupt it. But there is no evidence that the arguments, pleadings or veiled threats of those who spoke at this meeting will have the slightest influence on the delegates who assembled July 7. Those who left the Republican party with Senator Teller, because of its delaration in favor of the gold standard, have been laboring at Chicago with the leaders and delegates of the dominant faction to induce them to name Mr. Teller for president, and thus gain for the party the votes of the Populists and many Western Republicans who will not support men like Messrs. Bland and Boies; but it does not seem probable that this coalition will be perfected.

Sentiment in the East is not wholly in favor of the gold standard, as has been made apparent in several ways, chiefly hitherto by declarations of representative bodies of organized labor or by gatherings of farmers, but during the past fortnight President Andrews of Brown University has declared his belief that the United States can enter upon the free coinage of silver in a sixteen to one ratio without imperiling its honor or its prosperity; and Hon. George Fred Williams, ex-congressman from Massachusetts and the Democratic candidate for governor in the last gubernatorial campaign, has just made clear his exact position, hinted at in a recent speech before Maine Democrats, and announced his preference for free silver, rather than for a return to power of a party committed to a protective tariff, and his substantial sympathy for the downtrodden masses, whose struggle for right and light he discerns in the popular uprising which has swept through the South and West. Mr. Williams understands that his avowal of this belief will bring upon him the same social and professional ostracism that was meted out to anti-slavery leaders in Massachusetts before it became popular to be an opponent of slavery and the South. Whatever may be thought of the sanity of his judgment or the inconsistency of his present declaration with his record in Congress as an opponent of the Sherman Law, he must be credited with courage and indifference to his immediate personal welfare.

Will Japan Submit to Russia?

The Japan Mail of June 6 fails to give any news or comment that would indicate apprehension at that time of the startling, if real, demand by Russia, just reported by cable, that Japan must give up Formosa, the only tangible fruit she now possesses of her great victory over China. It does, however, report the retirement of Count Mutsu from the post of foreign minister, to whom must be credited the masterly diplomacy which has won from Europe and the United States the recent treaties which have given Japan a place as peer of the civilized nations, and carried her safely through a crisis of war and subsequent contact with jealous European Powers in a most admirable way. There is no hint that Count Mutsu's retirement was forced or due to aught save physical infirmities. If Russia has made any such demand upon Japan, we look to see it rejected. The forced recession of the Lia-Tong peninsula, and Russia's more recent virtual seizure of Korea, have filled the cup of national wrath so full that a demand that Formosa, where Japan has already spent much treasure and life, be given up would force Japan to begin now the fight that she hopes to defer until better equipped for it. Count Yamagata's recent courteous, but cool, treatment by Russia and Germany, as compared with the honors lavishly bestowed on Li Hung Chang, will not soften the hearts of the Japanese people, nor fail to accentuate the anti-Russian feeling in Japan.

NOTES.

Maryland's second lynching within a fortnight might have been prevented if the militia had been called out, as in Minnesota week before last.

The Raines Law went into effect last week in New York State. It will add $10,000,000 to the revenue of the State—a much larger sum than had been predicted, and lessen the number of saloons in New York and Brooklyn by nearly 1,000.

Cardinal Satolli's successor as papal delegate to the United States will be Mgr. Diomede Falconio, a Franciscan, who once studied in a seminary in this country, hence may be supposed to know us better than many of the Roman Italian clergy.

The State of Utah is asking for bids on $200,000 four per cent. bonds, payable, principal and interest, in gold coin, and yet its representatives in the recent Republican convention bolted because the party declared in favor of a monetary standard which the State must recognize if it expects the slightest consideration of its financial necessities by capitalists without the State.

Experiments made at one of New York's State hospitals are said to have demonstrated that insanity is bacterial in origin, and the July number of The State Hospital's Bulletin gives the details of this exceedingly significant and blessed triumph of applied science. A bacteriologist in a Brooklyn (N. Y.) hospital announces that he has discovered and utilized in immunizing patients the bacteria which cause lockjaw.

The Fourth of July was celebrated appropriately in London, Paris and Berlin by American officials and citizens. At the London banquet the Rt. Hon. James Bryce, M. P., pleaded for the creation of a permanent Anglo-American arbitration tribunal At Saratoga Sons and Daughters of the Revolution in large numbers listened to patriotic speeches and made pilgrimages to Mt. McGregor and the battlefield of Saratoga.

Canadian Roman Catholic Liberals propose to carry up to Rome the recent statements made by their spiritual advisers, respecting the duty of Catholics to obey implicitly political instruction, as well as spiritual, a duty which the laity refused to perform in the recent election, for which contumacy they hope for the papal approval. They overestimate Leo XIII.'s liberality, we fear. His latest encyclical is as reac ionary and narrow as any that Pius IX. ever issued.

A contest between union and non-union laborers in one of the great manufactories of Cleveland, O , assumed such proportions as to compel the calling forth of the militia, the issuing of a proclamation calling on rioters to disperse, the death of one and the injury of many workmen and a funeral procession rivaling that of the martyred Garfield. The Catholic priest who preached the funeral sermon had courage enough to rebuke the turbulence of the enraged friends of the dead and to counsel organized labor to refrain from anarchy.

The kernel of the decree just issued in Illinois, declaring unconstitutional the State law requiring the national flag to be displayed over every schoolhouse in the State during school hours, is in these words:

There is no question as to the right of the State to have the flag floated on any of its buildings wherever it is appropriate and whenever it chooses, and in any particular manner that it desires to have it floated. There is no question about that. The question made here is whether the legislature, under the constitution, has the power to declare a failure to do that in a particular manner a misdemeanor or a crime. The legislature has the power, under certain limitations, to define what is and is not a misdemeanor, what is and what is not a crime, but in doing so it must have for its object some sovereign purpose. It must have for its object either the maintenance of the police authority of the State, the morals of the State or the health of the State.

IN BRIEF.

That list of degrees on page 70 will reward at least a cursory glance. If you do not find your own name there remember that in less than twelve months the degree-producing establishments will be in operation again.

President Cleveland deserves commendation for his refusal to pardon postmasters recently found guilty of theft. "Improvident exercise of clemency"—to use his words—is all too common. Even clergymen are now petitioning Governor Morton of New York to pardon McKane, the Gravesend corrupter of the franchise!

The editor of the Richmond Christian Advocate, who recently poured out such epithets upon us as would have done credit to a buccaneer of the Spanish main, does not know that Prof. Austin Phelps is dead, and is quoting his famous letter hostile to manhood suffrage for the Negroes as if it represented the thought of today in Massachusetts.

Mr. W. T. Stead credits Mr. Gladstone's vitality and longevity to the following causes: Trust in God, a wife who has guarded and inspired him, the gift of sound sleep, regular habits of industry, total abstinence from tobacco and temperance in the use of liquor, diversified interests and out-of-doors life. He might have added, on Mr. Gladstone's own authority, his respect for and sane use of Sunday.

For admirable examples of self-consciousness the palm should be awarded to Li Hung Chang and Bismarck, who met recently. "I feel flattered in having the privilege of welcoming such an eminent statesman. We have both long helped our masters to govern each a great country," said Bismarck. "I have only been able to direct the affairs of China, while you are equal to governing the world," replied Li Hung Chang.

From speculative "investment" schemes to betting on races is only a step. The Observer says that one of its editors, a Presbyterian minister, has received "the card of a firm of turf commissioners, who offer to execute commissions. Orders can be sent to their office, or if sent after twelve, noon, direct to the race track." We have had no personal experience, but we suppose horses to be even more dangerous company for the uninitiated than bulls and bears.

Our Pilgrimage has attracted the attention of American journalists in London. The New York Tribune's representative, Mr. Ford, reports them as leaving England for Holland with memories of a most hospitable reception. The New York Evening Post cites their presence in England during the past weeks as conducive to bringing about Anglo-American amity and unity, its representative expressing the thought thus, "The New England pilgrim's meeting and Mr. Bayard's speech [at Gainsborough], coming at the moment when the pope's encyclical closes the door against the reunion even of the extreme Anglicans with Rome, have recalled the Anglo-American kinship in political and religious thought."

By erecting in Rochester, N. H., a statue of Rev. Amos Main, who for twenty-three years, prior to 1760, preached the gospel, healed bodily ills and settled disputes in that community, Mr. Charles Main, a merchant of San Francisco, has made known his generosity and respect for a worthy ancestor, and established a precedent that not a few New England towns might reasonably hope to see widely followed. Few men of their day were more deserving of remembrance than the pioneer preachers and pastors of New England. The erection of a statue is not the only way in which to commemorate them. Aiding the churches to which they ministered, so many of which are today struggling against the tide, is equally fitting.

When but twelve years old Harriet Beecher (afterwards Mrs. Stowe) wrote a remarkable composition for her school teacher. Its theme was this: Can the Immortality of the Soul Be Proved by the Light of Nature? This general theme never ceased to have a most vital connection with her life's best thought, but the question was answered for her, once for all, when she saw and knew the risen and ever-ruling Christ. How assured she was of the fact that he lives, the sentiment quoted by us and used on our cover page proves. The Congregationalist deems it appropriate that the journal which formerly had Prof. Calvin E. Stowe and later Edward Beecher as editors should recognize in an adequate way the service rendered to humanity by one who was so identified with men who in former days molded opinion through its columns.

Bishop J. M. Thoburn's word respecting the conditions which prevail in India and the disaster that would follow here were the United States to assume the silver basis may have some weight with those who know of his noble character, wisdom and common sense. Bishop Thoburn is the missionary bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church in India, where he has labored since 1859. He says:

They have the silver basis in India, have had it for centuries and it has been given a fair trial. It would ruin this country and bankrupt everybody. The foundation of business is stability and with a silver standard you can never have it. In Calcutta I can buy a suit of clothes for $40 today and perhaps for $20 tomorrow and the next day it will be $50. You can never tell from the number of dollars you own how much you are worth. The country is at the mercy of the money changers and speculators.

All who desire the disappearance of sectional feeling between East and West will do well to read the article in this issue by Mr. Birge of St. Louis. It breathes a spirit of regard for New England and an enthusiastic devotion to New England principles that we have reason to believe prevails throughout many sections of the Western country. In regard to the exact point raised by Mr. Birge we have solicited an opinion from Rev. A. E. Winship of this city, who was one of the Massachusetts delegates to the St. Louis Republican Convention. We, on our part, desire simply to do justice to all concerned in the matter. It is not necessary to disparage the part which broad-minded residents of St. Louis had in securing due recognition for the colored delegates in order to give Mr. Murray Crane and his associates the special praise which they have abundantly earned.

It is not often that Universalist churches seek to enlist in their service Congregational ministers, but Shawmut Avenue Universalist Church in this city, known of late as the Every Day Church, has recently extended a flattering call to Rev. R. B. Tobey. He was instrumental in building up at Berkeley Temple one of its most important departments, through which that church has been seeking to minister to the immediate needs of persons in all sorts of trouble and distress. Its Universalist neighbor, which, backed by some of the most substantial men in the denomination, has within the past year or two moved forward along institutional lines, would now lay hands on Mr. Tobey. His fitness for such work has been recognized far and wide in the community, but, from the point of view of our own denomination, we are glad that he has turned away from this avenue of interesting labor. Sympathetic as he is with new forms of work wherever carried on, he cannot bring himself to the sundering of ecclesiastical relations with the polity in which he has been reared and in which he has done such good service East and West.

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM THE INTERIOR.

The John Crerar Legacy.

The third annual report of Mr. Crerar's legacy of $50,000 to the Sunday School Union is out. It shows how much can be accomplished with a little money wisely expended. From the $2,500 which Mr. Crerar's capital furnished last year, fifty three Sunday schools were established, eighteen schools reorganized and strengthened and 165 other schools aided for the first time. In all 5,531 scholars were reached, of whom 377 were converted. During the year twenty-three have entered academies and higher schools of learning in the hope of obtaining an education. Seven churches have grown out of this work since the last report. This report covers work done in Illinois, where it is affirmed there are still 600,000 persons under twenty years of age who attend no Sunday school whatever, Michigan, especially the northern and more destitute portion, and Nebraska. Possibly a study of this report may lead some one who is anxiously considering how money may be wisely invested in Christian work to consider the claims of our Sunday School Society.

Major Whittle.

Chicago has been favored with a visit of several weeks from this earnest and gifted evangelist. He has been speaking mainly at the Chicago Avenue Church, but has made a few addresses to men in the rooms of the Y. M. C. A. Sunday, June 21, he spoke to a large number of men at the West Side Y. M. C. A., and both morning and evening conducted services in the First Church, Dr. Goodwin being at Amherst, where he preached the baccalaureate and celebrated the fortieth anniversary of his graduation. This is the second service of the kind Dr. Goodwin has performed this year.

Excursion to Milwaukee.

By the courtesy of the managers of the Whaleback, the ministers of the city were taken to Milwaukee and back Monday, free of charge. For their wives and children the fare was but a dollar. Quite a large number took advantage of this opportunity for an outing and for a look at our fair sister a hundred miles up the lake. In order that the day might not be wholly lost, arrangements were made for a union meeting morning and evening on the boat. At the morning session, over which Dr. J. G. Johnson of the New England Church presided, reports were made concerning the work of the civic federation and the bureau of charities, and suggestions offered as to the best methods of accomplishing their object. Secretary Easly spoke hopefully of what has already been done, as did Rev. Dr. J. P. Hale of the Kenwood Church. Mr. Gavett told the story of the brilliant political victory gained at the last election of aldermen under the direction and with the aid of the Chicago Commons, while Mr. Z. S. Holbrook of the Bibliotheca Sacra, in his discussion of the duties we owe the unfortunate, captivated his audience both with his sound sense and his sallies of wit. President Gates of Iowa College was also heard with much pleasure, and the positions he took were heartily approved. At the evening session, over which Dr. Burns of the Methodist church presided, Dr. Boyd, the successor of Dr. Hillis at Evanston, gave a hopeful and interesting review of the temperance movement in the South. This was all the more grateful as Dr. Boyd is from the South, and intimately acquainted with the temperance work there. The boat reached Chicago on its return trip a little before eleven in the evening, having beaten its rival, the Virginia, on the trip to Milwaukee by about one minute, although the latter had twenty-five minutes the start. Of course the managers of both boats deny all charges of racing! Yet ministers cheered at the victory of their boat not less earnestly than others not of their profession.

Hull House Summer School.

This began June 29 at Rockford in the buildings of the Ladies' College. It is chiefly a school of summer extension work. The object is to furnish as much outdoor study as possible. Botany and zoölogy are made prominent. Special instruction will be given in lawn tennis and gymnastics. Miss Ellen G. Starr of the Hull House is principal. Quite a number of pupils from Chicago are in attendance.

Considerable success seems to be attending the summer sessions of the public schools in Chicago. What is needed is more money, in order that more teachers may be provided and more schoolhouses opened. It is believed that this effort to prevent the loss which multitudes of children suffer from the long summer vacation will be the forerunner of a movement which cannot fail to be popular all over the country.

Summer Convocation at the University of Chicago.

This fifteenth convocation has been the great event in Chicago history this week, chiefly because Mr. and Mrs. Rockefeller have honored the university which their gifts have made possible with their presence and have met the professors, trustees and students face to face. The joy of the latter at seeing their benefactor found expression in college songs and college yells which President Harper, even in the convocation tent, had some difficulty in repressing. To greetings presented formally by the trustees, the various faculties of the university and the students Mr. Rockefeller's response was a model of good taste. He expressed great pleasure in what he had seen and his conviction that the money he had invested here was the best investment he had ever made.

Mr. Rockefeller seemed to take as much delight as the great audience in President Harper's enumeration of the pressing needs of the university, say to the extent of seven or eight millions of dollars in addition to the eleven and one-half millions already provided. But no intimation came from him as to any further gifts, although the discomfort attending the meeting of three thousand persons in a tent at a convocation was thought by some to have been intended as a reminder to the distinguished guest of the indispensableness of an assembly room for the members of the university and their friends. During the last ninety days the funds of the university have increased a little more than $275,000, or counting Mr. Rockefeller's gifts just twice this amount. Degrees of various kinds were conferred on 134 students. The whole number of students enrolled during the year has been 1986, a gain of more than a thousand over the attendance in 1894.

The presence of Rev. George Adam Smith, D. D., of Glasgow, Scotland, who gave the convocation address, was an event of interest. His theme was the part which the Old Testament has played in the education of the race, and how far its power to educate and inspire is affected by modern criticism. The address was a model in brevity and lucidity. Alluding to the need of a discussion of the theme named as made evident by Goldwin Smith's article in the North American Review on the Old Testament the Millstone of Christianity, Dr. Smith traced the influence which the Old Testament has had in forming the opinions and shaping the lives of the English and German peoples, and then proceeded to show that the higher criticism, so far from weakening faith in the supernatural origin of the Old Testament, has confirmed it, and that none are more firm in their faith in this supernatural origin than higher critics themselves.

A very interesting feature of the program of this convocation week was the presentation Wednesday morning at 10 30, in presence of specially invited guests, and at 8.30 P. M for the general public, by sixteen divinity students, of the synagogue service of the time of Christ. The young men were clothed in Oriental costume. They read from the Hebrew Bible and used the old Hebrew chants. Thursday the Haskell Museum building was formally dedicated and opened to the public. At the archæological conference, held during the day, Professor Lyon of Harvard made the chief address, at that on comparative religions Prof. A. V. Williams Jackson of Columbia was the chief speaker, as was Dr. Smith at the Biblical conference. In the dedication services of the museum Professor Goodspeed of the University of Chicago, Professor Hirsch, President Harper and Dr. Faunce of New York took part.

The laying of the corner stone of Hull Biological Laboratories, four in number, to be completed a year hence, with the principal address by President Jordan of Leland Stanford University and brief addresses by the head professors in the departments of zoölogy, botany, physics and anatomy, was the principal event of Friday. Saturday, the Fourth, was celebrated as a national holiday by the presentation of colors from the First Infantry, Illinois National Guard, by Colonel Turner, and an oration on the conditions and prospects of democracy by Prof. Bernard Moses of the University of California. Sunday Dr. Smith preached the convocation sermon, and at vespers Dr. Faunce made an address.

From this catalogue of exercises connected with this quinquennial convocation one may get a hint of the interest which is beginning to attach to these quarterly gatherings of the friends of learning in response to the invitation of this youthful university. The prospects for a large attendance at the summer session, especially of teachers and ministers, is encouraging. It would be hard to persuade President Harper to give up his plan of four terms in the year with only a week's vacation between them. Thus far the health both of students and professors has been excellent.

Chicago, Ill. FRANKLIN

Harriet Beecher Stowe.

By Rev. George Leon Walker, D. D.

Asked by The Congregationalist, in view of the passage to her better home last week of the venerable and honored Mrs. Stowe, to write a few lines concerning her, it is a pleasure to comply, for who can be other than glad to refresh in his own mind the sense of grateful satisfaction awakened always by the remembrance of so noble and beautiful a life as hers was? What a career, indeed, to admire and to wonder over that now finished story sets before us?

Begun in the quiet seclusion of a parsonage home among the green hills of Berkshire, with no more visible prophecy of distinction than belonged to birthright in the family of a gifted father, whose title to national eminence was yet, however, wholly to be proved; reaching on through the not infrequent experiences of ministers' daughters in the tasks of self-support and household aid by the labors of teaching; meeting modestly and faithfully the common responsibilities of wifehood and motherhood and their sometimes wearying round of harassing cares; suddenly by a victorious stroke of authorship lifted into national, international and world-wide eminence, and revealed not only as the possessor of brilliant genius, but by the special manner of its exercise, as a great benefactor of mankind, and thereafter for forty years known in more lands and languages than any other writer of fiction, living or dead, and at last passing onward into the unseen world surrounded by the tender, ministering hands of those knit to her by blood, but held also in loving sympathy all round the world, and her departure chronicled wherever the use of printing is known—certainly the story has elements of the interesting and the surprising surpassing almost any which can be elsewhere found. Welcome to the volume which shall sympathetically unfold as much of the outer life and of the inner struggles, achievements and experiences as may be allowed of this beautiful and splendid history!

Two things rise especially to mind in the first fresh tidings of Mrs. Stowe's departure. The most obvious and, indeed, greatest, of them is the indebtedness of her generation to her for the authorship of Uncle Tom's Cabin. Mrs. Stowe had tried authorship before, and with reasonable success. She followed her publication of Uncle Tom with other stories of a high order of merit. Estimated by these antecedent and subsequent narratives only, she would have taken and long would hold a conspicuous place in American literature; but Uncle Tom's Cabin occupies a unique place not only in her own writings but in all compositions of our era.

That simply as a story it is one of beauty and power, of pathos, attractiveness and charm, is sufficiently attested by the immensity of its circulation in lands where the special significance of it as bearing upon American social or political problems was unknown or uncared for. Its appeal to the simple, primal instincts of the human heart has sufficed to sustain its translation into a score of languages, whose possessors were absolutely in ignorance of the whole range of questions which gave the volume its main, and almost its only, interest in American eyes.

It is probably not too much to say that the book made its triumphant march through European and semi-Asiatic languages and dialects by virtue of interests which were aside from that which the author herself desired to infuse into it, or which cis-Atlantic readers found therein. Surely no higher token can be adduced than this of the inherent vitality and essential worth of the book regarded as a contribution to literature; and this, whatever allowance be made for haste of composition, or occasional imperfection of style, which some have taken pains to point out and criticise. A book which can thrill and charm, when translated out of its original language, readers so wide apart as Welsh and Wallachian, Russian and Spanish, Finn and Armenian can afford to smile at the pettinesses of small stylists and hyper-critical grammarians.

But Uncle Tom's Cabin was to American readers, and to a large extent to English readers also, not merely a thrilling and pathetic piece of novelistic literature. It was a tremendous political pamphlet. It was a mighty party document of the noblest type and thrown into the hot arena of civil debate. It was a tongue of flame in the argument of the greatest conflict of brain and heart this country has ever known. And it was most wonderful in its timeliness. Long, doubtless, unconsciously prepared for, in the old days when across the Ohio river near to her father's door came the flying fugitive from Southern bondage, led up to by sights and sounds and tales of woe and misery suited to sink deep into a soul far less sensitive and profound than hers, the actual issuance of that great appeal to heaven and to men against the iniquity of human slavery was most fortunate, let us say most providential, in its opportuneness.

Webster's great seventh of March speech in support of the elaborate compromises designed to settle the slavery question forever had been made in that month in 1850. With the making of that speech the Northern conscience had been strained to its last point of concession, and even that concession was insufficient. Mr. Webster recognized its insufficiency, and in September, 1852, went home to Marshfield to die. Things were in an electric state of tension. The Democratic convention, meeting in June of that year, indorsed the compromises of 1850 and the Fugitive Slave Law, and pledged the party against any further agitation of the slave question. The Whig convention on June 16 adopted a platform more cautiously worded, but taking essentially the same ground as to slavery.

The Free Soil convention met at Pittsburg Aug. 12. It declared slavery a sin against God and a crime against man. It denounced the compromise of 1850 and the two parties who were in its support. It nominated Hale and Julian for President and Vice-President.

It was in the pendency of this presidential contest that Uncle Tom's Cabin appeared. It was a blast upon a bugle horn, worth its thousands of men. Five hundred thousand copies of the book sold in the next five years carried with them an influence impossible to estimate in preparing for and nerving to that great martial struggle for human liberty which was less than seven years distant. The book entered as a factor—unseen indeed but not unfelt—into every hour of the succeeding debate, into every conflict of the war itself. It fought at Bull Run and Antietam and Gettysburg and Shiloh. And when the flag, at once of slavery and the Confederacy, went down at last at Appomattox Courthouse, among the forces which achieved that result for human weal and for the welfare of our land the thoughtful estimator of causes and agencies leading thereto cannot afford to overlook the influence of this woman and her epoch-marking political tractate—Uncle Tom's Cabin.

The only other thing concerning Mrs. Stowe which The Congregationalist's limited space in this issue gives room here to mention is the tender voicing she has given in some of her poems to the aspirations and resignations of many hearts under their own upreachings toward the light or their submission to providential mysteries. It is no secret to those who personally knew anything of Mrs. Stowe at all in those now far-off days when the boy by whose side she was a few days ago laid in the sweet burial-ground at Andover was suddenly taken from her that it was a shock and a trial almost impossible to bear. It was an experience which taxed to the utmost her trust in the divine Fatherhood. And yet she did trust. And out of that experience came some of the most comforting utterances which have supported others in somewhat kindred exigencies scattered up and down everywhere in the world.

But some of a group of surviving students of about that period at Andover have special cause to recall expressions, oral and personal, coming out of the same deep experience of the goodness and love of the Father above, which they bore away with them from the Stowe house where she then lived and which they have carried with them ever after. I could mention two or three names, now starred like hers, of men beloved and honored and useful while they lived in the Christian ministry, who brought away from what was when they entered it what they thought a "house of mourning" a counsel of hope and an encouragement of trust which never died from out their memories.

Her own experience of the reality of such a fact as trust and resignation and heavenly communion lends significance and reality to her words when she says:

Abide in me; there have been moments pure
When I have seen thy face and felt thy power.
Then evil lost its grasp, and passion, hushed,
Owned the divine enchantment of the hour.

These were but seasons beautiful and rare;
Abide in me, and they shall ever be.
Fulfill at once thy precept and my prayer—
Come and abide in me, and I in thee.

Yale Commencement was made more than usually impressive this year by the fact that the English order of exercises was closely followed. The degree of B. A. was conferred upon 280 students and that of Ph. B. upon 156. There were twenty-seven candidates for the degree of M. D., thirty-one for the degree of Ph. D., and seventy-six candidates for other degrees. Among the postgraduates were four women, the first members of their sex to take part in a Yale Commencement procession.——At Dartmouth College twenty-seven students received the degree of B. A., ten the degree of B. L. and eleven that of B. S.

Pilgrimage Letters.

Memorable Scenes and Experiences in Beautiful and Historic English Cities.

It is impossible to convey to the friends at home who are following with eager interest The Congregationalist's Pilgrimage Tour any idea of the reception accorded us by English people. From Plymouth to London it has been one continuous ovation. Our heads might be turned by this extraordinary attention did we not realize that it is offered to us not as individuals, but as representatives of Puritan principles and ideas. We are only ciphers, and the significant figure is Congregationalism. We sometimes hear complaints at home of a lack of denominational loyalty, but the charge can never be made against any member of this party, for after visiting these sacred shrines and seeing how our polity is cherished by our brethren on this side of the Atlantic we realize anew what a price was paid for our religious liberty and are proud of the glorious inheritance bequeathed to us.

EXETER CATHEDRAL.

Each place we touch seems to rival the preceding in its welcome, and even the dignitaries of the Established Church extend most fraternal greetings. Posters announce our coming, bulletin boards chronicle our arrival, churches are elaborately decorated in our honor, and both provincial and metropolitan papers devote large space to the details and significance of the Pilgrimage. At Exeter we were first met by Canon Edmonds and personally conducted by him through the beautiful cathedral. What he modestly termed an informal talk was really a choice lecture on mediæval art, which made every part of the noble edifice full of new meaning and grandeur to us. We are realizing more and more what a privilege it is to have men like him act as interpreters and guides.

But if we were charmed with the canon's learning and courtesy we were simply overwhelmed with the kindness of our Nonconformist friends. Owing to the train being late, and to other unavoidable delays, it was after nine o'clock in the evening when we reached the Congregational church, where an audience had patiently awaited our arrival for more than an hour. But when we entered the room, which was superbly decorated with flowers, British and American flags and Y. P. S. C. E. emblems, the large congregation rose en masse and welcomed us with clapping of hands. The appropriate hymn, "We come unto our fathers' God," was then sung in a way that puts our best congregational singing at home entirely in the shade. Rev. Justin Evans, the pastor, also representatives from the Methodist and Baptist churches, made brief addresses, full of brotherly love, to which several of the American Pilgrims responded, and every allusion to the strong tie which binds the two nations together elicited enthusiastic applause. One cannot resist the conviction that this little body of itinerant Congregationalists is being used, in the providence of God, to cement the bond by showing in miniature, as it were, the real feeling which exists between the English-speaking races. At Wells much the same program was repeated with some delightful variations. Here, as elsewhere, our Congregational friends were on hand to "greet the coming and speed the parting guest," with delegations at the arrival and departure of the trains. Here, too, Bishop Kenyon most graciously entertained us at the palace and one of the sweetest episodes of the day was the singing together of Bishop Ken's famous hymn, written on this very spot,

Glory to thee, my God, this night, after which the bishop pronounced the benediction. These little pauses for devotion in the rush and excitement of travel are inexpressibly refreshing, reminding us that we are journeying toward the eternal city as well as through the land of the Pilgrim Fathers. Our special cicerone, however, on this occasion was Rev. T. J. Keightley, pastor of the little Congregational church in Wells, a delightful old gentleman whose slender figure, silvery locks and courtly manners reminded one strongly of Dr. C. A. Bartol of Boston. At twilight he accompanied us in a stroll around the old moat, and pointed out the place where Bishop Ken used to sit with his dulcimer and sing his immortal hymns.

Although surfeited with pleasures we were driven that same afternoon to Glastonbury, where Rev. W. P. Hogben and the good people of that parish had a tempting afternoon tea ready in the prettily decorated church, with more words of cordial welcome and another brief devotional service. Here we met John Bright's daughter, Mrs. Clark, herself a Quaker, but in closest sympathy with other dissenting bodies, and ever ready to honor Americans who in turn enshrine her father in their hearts. To the joy of social fellowship was added the pleasure of visiting the picturesque ruins of the Abbey in company with our English friends, and as we drove back to Wells through the peaceful vale of Avilion, the landscape glorified with the rays of the June sunset, we realized anew that

Kind hearts are more than coronets
And simple faith than Norman blood.

At Salisbury and Winchester another downright, hearty British welcome was in store for the New World pilgrims at Salisbury's ancient shrines, demonstrating afresh that ours is an excursion of brotherhood as well as of pleasure. A body of ministers, also two of the city councilors, escorted us from the station to the lecture hall of the Congregational church where a sumptuous breakfast, at half-past ten, was provided by the pastor, Rev. E. Hassan, and a few friends. We are expected to do justice to an incredible number of meals per day in this hospitable land, on one occasion no less than three being served within two hours. One dish is sure to be most delicious strawberries with thick, yellow cream, and some of the party can almost equal Dr. Johnson in their tea-drinking, though no one has yet reached his measure of nineteen cups at a single sitting.

The ex-mayor, Mr. Pye-Smith, presided and embellished his graceful speech with apt quotations from our own poets. Brief addresses followed from both English and Americans, and then, with a fine, unselfish courtesy, we were surrendered to the dignitaries of the cathedral. Dean Boyle, a warm friend of the late Dr. Dale, received us in the lovely deanery gardens after the subdean, Dr. Bourne, had given us a scholarly outline of the history of that noble edifice of which Oliver Wendell Holmes said, "Ask me for the apple of the eye of England, I answer Salisbury Cathedral, and the close is the white of the eye." An invitation from the bishop to go over his palace was reluctantly declined on account of arrangements to visit Bemerton, George Herbert's home. It was a privilege indeed to be admitted to the cozy rooms of that quaint old rectory, to ramble through the pretty garden, to enter the study, which remains just as it was in Herbert's day, and, last of all, to gather in the tiny church, the smallest but one in England, and with bowed heads listen to words of prayer from Dr. Robie of our party, the modest, scholarly New England parson whose spirit is akin to the saintly rector of long ago. Mr. Whittemore read two of Herbert's poems, and as our pilgrim feet turned from this peaceful rural shrine we felt that verily we had stood on holy ground.

SALISBURY CATHEDRAL.

To the rich experiences of this full day was added another pleasure in the overwhelmingly cordial reception by the good people of Winchester in British Hall at nine o'clock in the evening. Here the decorations were unusually artistic, even the entrance being lined with palms and potted plants. Rev. C. E. Dickinson, Mayor Dyer and a host of friends from all the Nonconformist churches entertained us with choice music, speeches, refreshments and another exhibition of that warm fellowship which is a distinguishing feature everywhere. It was a weary set of pilgrims who sought their couches about midnight, but notwithstanding they were on hand on the morning of June 17 for such a unique celebration of Bunker Hill Day as never fell to the lot of Americans before. The whirligig of time brings about strange changes, and it was a curious coincidence that on the anniversary of that memorable battle between British and Americans we should have been entertained at Farnham Castle by the lord bishop of Winchester, Dr. Randall Davidson, and his accomplished wife, who is a daughter of the late Archbishop Tait.

Until the English language has a richer vocabulary than now no words can do justice to the occasion. Of all the bishops' houses in the land none is more grandly situated than this, and no other, not even Windsor, has been held so long by an unbroken succession of men. It stands on an eminence overlooking the valley of the Wye, with its famous hop gardens, and to the east is the great deer park, covering over 300 acres, the only episcopal deer park remaining in England in which there is historical evidence that deer have been kept for 600 years. His Lordship and lady graciously received us at the very entrance, and we assembled immediately on the spacious staircase, with its magnificent oak carvings, passing along the way traversed by kings and bishops for a thousand years, as the bishopric of Winchester dates from the days of Ethelbald. In this place of inspiring memories, standing midway on the stairs, his Lordship gave us a wonderfully interesting lecture, outlining the stirring events of this early period, down through the days of Henry de Blois, who made the castle a formidable fortress, through the miserable reign of John, of whom the chronicler said, "Hell was made fouler by the entrance of his soul," on to the Tudor period, when the names of Fox, Wolsey, Gardiner, Mary Tudor and hosts of others burned on the pages of history, down through the civil wars, when the castle was tossed like a shuttlecock between the contending armies, and up to the present, when the preceding incumbent, Bishop Thorold, undertook "to make it as easy as possible for a successor to reside at the castle" by adding modern improvements. Here the unhappy Mary stopped on her way to Winchester to marry Philip of Spain, here Elizabeth frequently tarried and James I. made himself so obnoxious by his costly visits that the bishop tartly inquired "if he looked on Farnham as an inn."

This remarkably lucid historical sketch, occupying about an hour, was the best preparation possible for our subsequent inspection of the castle and its old keep, approached through a subterranean passage. We were divided into four groups, one each under the guidance of his lordship, Mrs. Davidson and two other members of the household. Among the points of special interest was the bed-chamber of Bishop Morley, chaplain to Charles II. in his exile and practically the rebuilder of the castle. It is a bare little room, for he was a man of ascetic habits, who rose at 5 A. M. the year round, took only one full meal a day and denied himself the comfort of a fire in the coldest weather. A single small window faced the east and a dark recess served as a "penitential cell." Other fascinating places were the old thirteenth century kitchen, probably the work of De Lucy, with its immense fireplace at one end, and the stately banquet hall where half the sovereigns of England have sat at meat. A balustraded gallery runs round two sides and over the richly carved fireplace hangs the melancholy portrait of Bishop Morley. On the lintel of one huge beam is inscribed the old French motto: Au Dieu foy; aux amis foyer. (To God faith; to friends the hearth.)

It was in this room, teeming with historic associations, that we were entertained at luncheon, after a most uplifting service in the domestic chapel at which Mr. Davidson wore the blue ribbon and seal of the Garter over his bishop's robe. The former he kept on during the meal. The chapel is a long, narrow room separated from the corridor (where stands the organ which Mrs. Davidson played) by a beautiful Renaissance screen of open work. The stalled seats, which our little company nearly filled, are of rich dark wood and the wall panels are carved with designs of cherubs' heads, fruit and flowers. The opening hymn

O God, our help in ages past,

the Scripture lesson and prayers drew us all nearer to the throne of heavenly grace and deepened in each soul a sense of the preciousness of our common Christian faith. One of the most enriching experiences of our trip thus far was this chapel service, together with the opportunity of breaking bread with a host and hostess like Bishop and Mrs. Davidson, whose urbanity and generous hospitality will never be forgotten by The Congregationalist's Pilgrims. The tenor of his formal greeting, given at the close of the meal, may be inferred from these characteristic sentences: "In our political, our social, our civic life, no less than in our religious life, mutual toleration and friendship and affection will bring peace instead of strife. . . . We shall be thankful indeed if, even in the smallest degree, such a gathering as ours today tends to render absolutely impossible what would undoubtedly be the greatest disaster the world has ever seen. I thank you for coming here today. I thank you for the kind way you have received what little my wife and I have tried to do in welcoming you, not to a private home, but rather to a great historic house which we are privileged for the time to hold in trust for the good of all."

Dr. Guinness Rogers was kindly included among the guests, and he, with Dr. Dunning and Hon. J. A. Lane, made fitting responses. As we drove away from the castle in a gentle rain, our hearts filled with deepest gratitude for the privileges of the morning, we carried with us memories as fragrant as the flowers which bloomed in every room and added the sweetness of their welcome to the words spoken by the noble bishop and his wife. It is one of the characteristics of true culture that it not only adds steadily to one's knowledge, but as steadily develops the capacity for acquiring knowledge, and the instinct for discovering in every person, relation, event and experience something of permanent value as a means of enrichment.—*H. NEW ENGLANDERS AND THE WEST.

BY JULIUS C. BIRGE, ESQ., ST. LOUIS.

The statement has often been made that the noble spirit of New England civilization has been in some degree imparted to every commonwealth in the American republic, and that her best institutions have been planted in every State and Territory where our national emblem floats. This fact is alike conceded by the descendants of the Southern cavalier as well as by the sons of the Puritan.

New England, however, sometimes unconsciously fails to recognize her children when transplanted to their new Western or Southern homes, apparently forgetting that when a Yankee dons the sombrero on the Texan plains, or commands a steamer on the Mississippi, or digs for gold in the placers of the Rocky Mountains, he not only does not lose his New England spirit and education, but, on the contrary, retains all of his love for liberty and equality and would as freely divide his earnings with one of the "wards of the nation" as he would have done before he crossed the Hudson River. Neither Western or Southern life is calculated to stimulate a respect for caste or false social distinctions. Not only is it true that no new character is imparted to a New Englander who has breathed the air, for example, of St. Louis and watched the development of this beautiful city of the Interior, but it can hardly be said he changes his characteristics.

I am led to make with considerable emphasis these statements in the face of numerous articles which have recently appeared in the columns of Eastern journals. The Congregationalist of June 18 says: "Thanks to the backbone and devotion to principle of the Massachusetts delegation, a concerted attempt of the hotel proprietors to exclude the Afro-American delegates from the St. Louis hotels has failed, the Massachusetts white men letting it be known that if the two representative Afro-American delegates from the State of Sumner and Phillips were boycotted, then the State delegation would cancel its contract with the Southern Hotel and seek quarters elsewhere."

I am sure The Congregationalist would not intentionally give a wrong statement or a wrong coloring even to a matter of this character, calculated to cast discredit on the men who have endeavored to the best of their ability during the recent Republican convention especially to honor the colored representatives of the nation who have been the guests of the city. The impression conveyed by this article, as well as by other articles referred to, is clearly this, namely: that the Negro is not apt to receive, and in fact did not receive, but was rather denied, the honor and consideration which would have been accorded to him in the State which produced "Sumner and Phillips," and that, through the demands of Massachusetts men, justice was secured for such delegates when it would have been obtained for them in no other way.

Now the facts are otherwise. I was a member of the committee on entertainment, on which committee also were other New England men and Southern men as well, and with them two highly intelligent colored men. The Afro-American delegates were the subject of special consideration, and abundant accommodations were provided for them long before the convention assembled, and the delegates, especially in the South, who failed to apply for accommodations were written to and urged to apply. Failure by these delegates, or by any member of these delegates, in any case to secure the best which the city afforded was the result of their own failure to respond to letters which were written them. Moreover, the colored members of the committee at all times expressed their highest satisfaction with everything that was done. The exact copy of the letter of announcement made by the hotels named therein to the national Republican committee was as follows:

THE SOUTHERN, ST. LOUIS, MO.,
June 10, 1896.

To the National Republican Committee: In regard to the accommodations for the colored delegates to the Republican convention, promised by the Business Men's League of St. Louis while in Washington last December, to be furnished by the hotels of St. Louis, I am authorized to say that the Southern Hotel, St. Nicholas Hotel, Lindell Hotel, Laclede Hotel will live up to that promise in spirit and letter, and will make no distinctions whatever, but will grant to all delegates to the Republican Convention equal rights and privileges.

Respectfully,
[Signed] W. R. ALLEN,
President Southern Hotel Co.

Notwithstanding all that had been done prior to the convention for the comfort and accommodation of all the delegates, a small Southern delegation, without presenting any credentials whatever, applied to a hotel. After they had failed to respond to the letters of the committee, of course they were not received as they would have been had they made arrangements in advance; and as a matter of fact, too, as their own colored brethren said, they were not in the best of condition to be received. Now because of this failure to comply with conditions, the gentlemen of color on the committee themselves being judges, telegrams went abroad indicating that colored delegates would not be properly treated in St. Louis or in a Southern city.

This is injustice. When we take the existing conditions and study the provision made, we are ready to say, fearlessly, that St. Louis would, under all conditions, treat the Negro as favorably as he would be treated in good old Puritan Boston, and we do not hesitate to make some comparisons between the two cities. For example, the population of the two cities is approximately the same, St. Louis being somewhat the larger and rapidly growing. The percentage of the native, or American born, population, however, is much the greater in St. Louis. According to the eleventh census, the foreign born population of Boston is thirty-five and one-half per cent.; of St. Louis twenty-five and one-half per cent. The proportionate American born population of St. Louis is, however, increasing much faster than that of Boston. Moreover, the foreign born population of St. Louis is chiefly a strong and thrifty German element; that of Boston is chiefly Irish.

It is well known that the Irish are not favorably disposed toward the Negro, and one of the difficulties at St. Louis was in the adjustment of the table and other service with the Irish waiters in some of the St. Louis hotels. This caused the only delay to the reception of the colored delegates, but be it said for the commendation of the Irish waiters of the hotels, they laid aside their prejudice and accepted the situation. Further, the managers of the leading St. Louis hotels are New England men. The owner of the Southern Hotel, referred to, is from an honored family from Pittsfield, Mass., and the manager was born and reared in Maine of the best New England stock. These men would never discriminate against the Negro in St. Louis any more than they would do it in New England.

According to the last census the Negro population in Boston was 8,125, of which 1,052, or less than thirteen per cent., were in the schools; the Negro population in St. Louis was 26,865, of which 5,022, or nineteen per cent., were in the schools, and their schools thoroughly well equipped. The alien population of St. Louis was in 1890 only 12,361, while that of Boston was 26,184. It would surprise many unfamiliar with the West to know also that the New England population in St. Louis is large and dominates in a great degree all the professions and avenues of business. The factories, which employ, according to the census reports, 94,051 employés as against 90,805 in Boston, are controlled in a considerable degree by New England men. Again, Missouri furnished for the Union army during the Rebellion 108,773 men, nearly fifty per cent. more than was furnished by any New England State except Massachusetts, and these Union men had, if possible, far more to contend against in their efforts to uphold the Union and destroy the curse of slavery than did the soldier of the North, where the sentiment was all for the Union.

Despite all these divisions and differences of opinion a generation ago, when armies fought with armies, today there were at the head of the committee who endeavored to entertain the Massachusetts delegates prominent business men of St. Louis who wore the gray in the War of the Rebellion, who are now among the strong supporters of the interests of our city and our country; and there are none in the Union more ready to uphold our national honor, or more eager to honor the colored delegates than these same men. They and we who have come here from the North long ago laid aside sectional prejudice and sectional bitterness, and we sincerely hope that New England will not even unintentionally hinder progress, but will open her eyes and look toward the setting sun, and she will find a new Union growing up in the great Southwest, where we are rapidly forgetting all differences and joining heart to heart and hand to hand in enterprises of both church and state. We send many of our boys and girls to New England colleges, and New England sends many of its sons and daughters to positions of influence and power in the great West and Southwest. Our clergymen, our professional men and our business men are many of them from New England. We do, or ought to, clasp hands with similar views of right and justice under the dear old flag that floats over us all.

THE COLORED MEN AT ST. LOUIS.

BY REV. A. E. WINSHIP.

It is unfortunate that any serious misunderstanding should arise over the incident connected with the colored delegates at St. Louis. These are the occasions which widen sectional breaches.

The facts seem to be that provision was made by the local committee in good faith for all Southern colored delegates who applied in season, that one delegation did not respond to the local committee of arrangements in season to be provided for as it would have been earlier, that this led to unwise publicity and much excitement, that no one ever contemplated the election of colored delegates or alternates from the North, that Massachusetts had a large number of the best rooms at the Southern, that that hotel had no expectation of entertaining colored men, that the manager anticipated serious conflict with his help and possibly with other guests if they were admitted, that he did not see his way clear to receive colored delegates, that there were frequent conferences between the manager, owner and Mr. W. Murray Crane, Massachusetts member of the national committee, during June 9 and 10, that the New Englanders in St. Louis and all other members of the business committee did all in their power to help the manager find a way to receive the colored men, that on June 10 the managers of four prominent hotels, including the Southern, decided upon the only course ever open to them and wrote the national committee that there would be no discrimination against the colored delegates and alternates, that thereafter the cordiality toward the Massachusetts colored alternate was in every way the same as toward any white delegate and this was as true at the aristocratic Country Club reception as at the hotel.

There is no question but that W. Murray Crane's quiet, wise insistence that there was nothing else for the Southern hotel to do was a leading factor in the case.

OUR ANGLO-SAXON BROTHERHOOD.*

BY GRANVILLE B. PUTNAM.

O Albion to thee,
Famed isle across the sea,
Our greetings speed.
All hail, our fatherland!
Whence came that Pilgrim band
To plant this waiting strand
With freedom's seed.

One speech on either shore,
One God we both adore,
One prayer we raise.
We tell of Runnymede,
And Shakespeare's worth concede,
As we our valor plead,
Our poets praise.

This sturdy, stalwart race
First westward turned its face,
Now widely roams.
Fast by the Arctic snows,
And where the Ganges flows,
Or South Sea zephyr blows,
They make their homes.

With them go righteous rule,
The college and the school
To train their youth.
The Puritan's stern will,
His faith and courage fill
The hearts of Saxons still
To stand for truth.

Be ours the purpose grand
To bear from land to land
This truth's bright flame.
But should we scorn our trust
And fail through sloth or lust,
Or grovel in the dust,
Then shame, thrice shame!

But this shall never be,
The banner of the free
Shall lead the way.
The walls of caste must fall,
Oppression heed our call,
Give equal rights to all.
God speed the day!

The Ministerial Problem Once More.

Further Opinions Called Forth by Recent Discussion in the Press and on the Platform.

A REMEDY SUGGESTED.

A surplus of ministers is more apparent than real. Most applicants for vacant pulpits are ministers still holding places. In a given section of country of a hundred churches, paying a salary of eight hundred or upwards, ten may be vacant. Of the ninety pastors it may be presumed that one-third have an eye on these vacant pulpits, and because of the great uncertainty are not content with making application to one of the vacant places, but each one of the thirty applies to the whole, ten. Therefore each of these ten churches not only receive these thirty applications, but say, a score more from men outside of our communion and from recent seminary graduates, giving them fifty men to choose from.

Two things result. A church that has fifty men signifying their readiness to accept a call concludes at once that they are held in favor and can now select a rare bird for their pulpit, and forthwith proceed to examine their feathers and hear their song note. The gray and the ordinary are ruled out at once, for why should a church favor such when a man in his young prime is presented, or why take up with a common sort of a preacher when one with striking eccentricities is in waiting? No wonder that so many committees and churches become demoralized.

The result to ministers is that a large fraction, composed of those who have reached fifty years of age and those who have nothing peculiar in either manner or doctrine, have almost no chance of acceptance, or of even a hearing, worthy men though they are. They are gradually compelled to take a smaller church or to go out of the ministry. And of the thirty candidates, say, remaining out of the fifty any one of them stands only one chance in thirty of securing any given church, and only one chance in three of being called to any one of the ten.

The remedy for this condition of things is largely with the ministry. First, let them be more contented with their present field. Second, let there be no seeking a church while holding a church. Why should not all our ministerial associations adopt a rule that to have a recognized standing a member shall sign a rule that he will not while holding a pulpit make application for a vacant pulpit.

M. D.

STILL ADVOCATING THE HOLDING-ON POLICY.

Has The Congregationalist space for a last word from the much criticised and much advised "Anxious Observer," who said the first word on the ministerial problem? [See Congregationalist, April 16, 1896] Man lives by bread, but there are times when he is called to sacrifice bread for conviction's sake. A right eye or a right hand is to be sacrificed, if need be, to principle. This has been ignored in most references to my article, and in all the good advice given. "Has a minister any moral right to hold on to a church for the sake of support when he is an obstacle to its successful work?" No. Has a church a moral right to turn its faithful pastor adrift without means of support, because he is not perfect and a few "leading members" are dissatisfied? More consecration is rightly demanded of the ministry; is not the same demand to be made of the church? "E. W. P." refers to $800 as though it were low watermark. I referred to a little more than half that amount, the result of a sudden and unavoidable falling off of revenue.

The quoted expression, "marking time," to me meant, not an insincere dress parade in church and pastoral work for the sake of a good living, a sort of drum-major masquerade, but faithful service with very small statistical results—the conditions prevailing very widely in city and country, if our measure is proportional, not absolute. Shall a man with a family get out of a field because he does not see results enough to suit him, that seem commensurate with his faithful labors, or because a few are dissatisfied? With whom are all satisfied? A man knowing past conditions, but not present, goes out like Abraham, not knowing whither he is going, but, unlike Abraham, expecting a satisfactory settlement within three months. "S. E. W." has related one such experience, and every minister who knows the times can match it with others equally pathetic. It was in the hope of possibly saving some uninformed brother from suffering, and in the interest of the needed consecration, that I wrote the first and now write this last word.

Anxious Observer.

THE OVERCROWDING MORE APPARENT THAN REAL.

At the recent meeting in Hartford of the Connecticut General Association Rev. S. A. Barrett of East Hartford read a valuable paper on the general subject of prevailing conditions in the Congregational ministry. The paper embodied much information carefully gathered and arranged. We regret that we have space for only a portion of the facts and conclusions presented.

In Connecticut there are in round numbers ninety ministers on our list without charge. Deducting from this number those who are aged and infirm, those employed as educators, etc., and those who have turned aside to business and other lines of work by reason of physical inability or felt and acknowledged lack of qualification, and there are left a possible fourteen who might be thought of in connection with pastoral work. But even this needs some further modification. Taking out the several who are out of the State, and those who have been out of the pastorate so long and for such reasons that it is fair to suppose that the churches do not care for them (alas, that there should be such) and there remain nine to be considered as available candidates. But there are twenty pastorless churches in the commonwealth, two churches for every minister on our list duly accredited, whom any one would recommend, yet the recommendation is unheeded, these brethren are compelled to wait, while the churches go through their long list of fifty applications. A striking situation indeed.

Does it mean that the rest of the country is overstocked and is pouring back upon us its unused material? The last Year-Book sets the number of Congregational churches in the United States at 5,342, and states the total number of ministers to be 5,287, of whom at least 1,000 are either too aged, or are educators and secretaries, leaving about 1,100 more Congregational churches than there are Congregational ministers, or rather ministers now on our Congregational lists, to supply them. In view of these facts, both in regard to our State and the country, the question comes, where is the surplus that is so overcrowding us and from which come these long lists of applications with which the churches are being afflicted? Perhaps some may say that it is from the theological seminaries that are grinding forth newly made ministers just for the sake of doing so that they may continue to exist. It may seem so, and yet the total number of graduates for 1894 was 124, of whom it is safe to say that twenty-four either continued in fourth year studies or went into distinctively mission work at home or abroad, so that we can say 100 graduates were ready for the pulpits. The increase of churches that year amounted to 106 and the deaths of ministers to ninety-eight, of whom twenty-five were in service, thus making 131 places opened by natural growth and the falling out of workers to be filled by 100 new men from the seminaries, and that is saying nothing of the 1,100 more churches than ministers. And this not for one year only; it has been going on for many years. Indeed, the average for the last five years shows even greater discrepancy between the supply from this source and the demands.

If figures mean anything these certainly indicate that the seminaries are not to be condemned for what they are trying to do in the line of making ministers, at least so far as numbers go. One hundred to meet a need of 1,200 is not overdoing the matter on their part. The idea of an overcrowded ministry hardly stands the test of figures, and yet it is not altogether surprising that the idea prevails so strongly. About the existing state of affairs, which has given rise and strength to this idea, so far as I have been able to investigate it, three things can be said.

First, that it is true that those outside our State are trying to get in among us. Second, what is more evident and to the point, large numbers are coming to us from other denominations, especially Methodists. On our State roll of Congregational ministers are said to be twenty-two who have either been Methodist ministers or under Methodist training. That they are converted to Congregationalism and come to stay is by no means evident, as many instances go to show. But even this number, as large as it is, does not account for the apparent overcrowding.

We observe, in the third place, that the long lists of applicants are not made up of the unemployed who are standing idle, but to a large extent of the names of those already in active service. That fifteen or twenty churches have each fifty or sixty candidates "on the string" does not mean that each has different lists; they are practically the same. In view of the figures already given, how could it be otherwise? One brother made six applications in six weeks and another, during the first year of his pastoral charge of one church, was for a period of several months away more Sundays than at home looking for another and, after a little more than a year, was blessed with calls to two. I suppose that there is a class (and I fear that it is not a small one) who might properly be called "ministerial repeaters," i. e., their names are to be found on eight or ten of these lists at the same time, and that, too, with a sort of periodic regularity—men who are already holding on to churches even if it could not be said that churches are holding on to them. The committee of one church had their attention called to the availability of at least five pastors located and doing good work all within a radius of twenty miles, four of whom still remain where they were and one, after several years of "Barkis is willin'," received a call out of the State.

The simple statement of the case is that figures and experience do not show a surplus of ministers. There is beyond question a surplus of applications, but that is quite another thing, and it is considerably more damaging to the cause than an actual surplus would be. If an attempt should be made to assign to every Congregational church a Congregational minister (even including those from other denominations now on our Year-Book) there would not be enough men to go around, and this seems to be true both in regard to the State and the country at large. . . .

The causes lie largely in certain social, financial and educational considerations, i. e., it becomes a serious question to an educated minister whether he can, or ought to, settle down in a little place on a small salary deprived of social privileges and educational advantages, where he must keep up a hand to hand struggle in order to maintain his family, to which he has as much right as any one, and to educate his children, whom he loves as dearly, and of whom he has as fond hopes, as any father. There are some to whom such a prospect never presents itself, but there are others, and they are not few, before whom it stands as a vivid reality and, like the irrepressible ghost, "will not down." It must be so if, as things are, even a majority of churches are to have pastors. In view of it, one can hardly wonder at the spirit of restlessness which seems to possess the ministry, and of which there is so much criticism and complaint.

TOO MUCH GENERAL SUPPLYING.

The magnitude of the "supply" service in our denomination and the fact that it is rendered so largely by men who are at the time "unavai'able" for real pastoral service must, in the nature of the case, have a great deal to do with the present distress among our ministers. The "supply" service is quite distinct from the pastoral service, and is, in the main, rendered by those who are at the time unavailable for pastoral service, namely, secretaries of the various benevolent societies, college presidents, professors, pastors emeriti, aged retired ministers, ministers of other denominations, and especially theological students and postgraduates in quest of literary honors, etc. In some of the newer States, and in others where our churches are few in number, the "supply" service is not much in demand as yet, owing to the difficulty of finding suitable persons to render it. In other States, especially the New England, it is in great demand for the contrary reason, and the additional one of cheapness. In Massachusetts and Connecticut the "supply" service has been in great demand for years and is constantly increasing in popularity, many churches seeming to prefer it to regular "pastoral service." In Connecticut it is mainly rendered by professors and students. Prominent vacant churches within reach are almost wholly supplied by theological professors, and the feebler churches by divinity students, either licensed or unlicensed.

There is no law in church or state against such practice, and when times were "good" no one noticed it very much. But now, in view of the prevailing distress and the apparent crowding among our ministers, some are inclined to take the ground that it is unfair for our churches to take this "supply" work away from them and to give it to men who are thereby enabled to draw double salary, while so many good men are suffering for the want of professional service. Aside from this mercenary consideration against the employment of professors and students in connection with this "supply" work, the old and unrefuted objection, viz., that it interferes with their prior obligations, still holds and is worthy of serious attention. We have able men as theological professors and we have able young men as theological students, but there is not a college or a seminary professor in this or any other land who has brain enough and soul enough to enable him to go off to supply churches on Sundays during term time, and yet return to do his full duty by his classes on Mondays. And there are no divinity students in this or any other land who can go off to supply churches during term time and yet do their full duty by their seminary course. The thing is simply impossible in both cases. D.

THE POVERTY OF MANY CHURCHES.

Rev. T. E. Davies of New Haven has studied carefully this general problem, and presents from time to time important considerations deduced from analyses of the actual situation. In the New Haven Journal and Courier of June 3 he has an article from which we quote certain noteworthy statistics:

According to the official report already referred to we had, at the close of the year A. D. 1894, 5,342 Congregational churches in this country. But what of their record during that year in respect to the important matter of pastoral support? When a minister devotes his time to serve a church then that church must support him unless he has private means of his own, which is seldom the case. How many of our churches did this in the year 1894?

I give below the record of what fully eighty-two per cent. of them did in that respect. They are credited as follows:

One church paid its pastor $12,000. Another paid $11,000. Five churches paid $10,000 each; one paid $8,000. Two churches paid $7,500 each; two churches paid $7,000. Nine churches paid $6,000 or upward, but less than $7,000. Twenty churches paid $5,000 or upward, but less than $6,000. Twenty-seven churches paid $4,000 or upward, but less than $5,000. Eighty-four churches paid $3,000 or upward, but less than $4,000. Sixty-six churches paid $2,500 or upward, but less than $3,000. One hundred and twenty-two churches paid $2,000 or upward, but less than $2,500.

Two hundred and forty-two churches paid $1,200 or upward, but less than $1,300. Three hundred and seventy-three churches paid $1,000 or upward, but less than $1,100. One hundred and eighty-five churches paid $900 or upward, but less than $1,000. Two hundred and eighty-nine churches paid $800 or upward, but less than $900. Three hundred and ten churches paid $700 or upward, but less than $800. Three hundred and fifty-seven churches paid $600 or upward, but less than $700. Two hundred and fifty-seven churches paid $500 or upward, but less than $600. One hundred and ninety-seven churches paid $400 or upward, but less than $500. Two hundred and twenty-five churches paid $300 or upward, but less than $400. Two hundred and twenty churches paid $200 and upward, but less than $300. Two hundred and twenty churches paid $100 or upward, but less than $200. And one hundred and twenty-one churches paid less than $100 each toward the support of a pastor during the year A. D. 1894.

Such is a part of the official showing in this case, but not the whole of it. Nearly 1,100 churches failed to report any pastoral support for that year. And, as fully four-fifths of them were small, feeble and practically defunct churches, we have no reason to suppose that they really contributed much of anything at all for that purpose.

If we add 960 of this number to the 1,241 churches last mentioned above which paid less than $600 toward pastoral support during the year under consideration, we shall have at least 2,200 churches which did not, and possibly could not, pay more than a fraction of the amount required to support a pastor in this country. If we assume, therefore, that $600 is the very least amount on which a Christian minister can manage to live, then the very heart of our trouble will lie before us in plain view, for then it will appear that out of our 5,342 churches only 3,142 actually supported pastors during the year 1894. Our trouble, therefore, is not too many ministers who are available for genuine pastoral service, but too many churches which are either unable or unwilling to provide the required pastoral support.

SOME GENTLE COUNSEL TO SUMMER VISITORS.

BY EXPERIENCE'S HUSBAND.

I haven't written for The Congregationalist for quite a little time, because, for one reason, Experience (her full name is Ann Patience Experience) said to me, after I had written a piece for the paper, "There, Joel, I think you have talked enough unless you can talk more sensibly." Now when she looks at me out of the corner of her eye, and speaks that emphatic, I usually meekly reply, "Well, yes, Experience, perhaps you know best." But then, I wrote a piece praising the Salvation Army, and another praising the Young People's Society, and look at them now, are not they spread and spreading broadcast over the land? And I cannot tell what part I had in their becoming so popular!

When I started to write today I was thinking about a poor, struggling church that I had recently visited, and of the brave efforts the good people were making to keep up the work, and of their great faith in God that made them, in spite of enough discouragements to crush out the spiritual life of a saint, hold on steadfastly and persist in the Lord's work. For the Lord's work I certainly think it is, else how could they modestly point to three churches that had grown out of theirs, and they still going forward? It was when with Experience I was stopping over Sunday at a watering place, and when I inquired upon Sunday morning where they had gospel preaching, and was told that it was two miles away, I girded up my loins and prepared to tramp the distance. A lady said, "Now, Uncle Joel, you are here for a rest, and you owe it to yourself to keep quiet today, in order that you can take up your work tomorrow." But I said to myself, "Get thee behind me, Satan," and inasmuch as the lady was no blood relation, I didn't care what name I called her by.

When I got to the church, I found a place that had formerly been used for a schoolhouse, a few people and a minister. The minister acted as though it was a great act of condescension on his part to come and preach to this poor people, for they were very poor in this world's goods, although rich in faith. And when the sermon was finished—and it was a very good one, although it was colder than Greenland's icy mountains—then his mightiness walked out and left the people to carry on their Sunday school as best they might. The session of the school was more an index of the people than the preaching service, for the iceberg had gone and the people had only themselves to warm. And after the school was over, a dozen of those people gathered around me, and we had a good old-fashioned love-feast, and I found what earnest souls were to be found in such discouraging environments. One old lady said to me, "I am so glad you have talked to us, for you have done us so much good." Another, seeing me talking to the old lady, sidled up to me, not knowing what the old lady had said, and remarked, "I hope you won't mind what she is saying, as she is only half-witted!" I did not mind. Nevertheless, the people were dead in earnest and worked accordingly.

I asked one lady if the summer visitors had helped the church and she said, "O yes, indeed, they have done a great deal for us." But she spoke with a little hesitancy, as though she was afraid a word that she might say would react and disgruntle some one. But I followed that church up quite a little, and while I found that the summer Christians were helpful of their money in a certain way, they were sparing of the hearty shake of the hand, of the cordial smile, and, above all, of their prayers for the prosperity of this little twig on the branch of the tree of Zion. This little church could truly say to the summer friends, "It is not yours that we want so much as you!" When a visitor turns to a neighbor and remarks, in an undertone, "Did you ever hear such a thin voice as that soprano singer had!" and her companion nods assent, they little think that they are overheard, and they do not know, what that poor soprano knows, that in order to get herself and her husband and five children to church she had to rise very early in the morning and work hard until the bell rang, in order that she might present her voice, a willing sacrifice, to the Lord. And I doubt not the sacrifice is accepted of him who knows every heart.

So I would say to the dear, kind, generous, but thoughtless, summer comer, "One thing thou lackest"; give of your smile, your kindly word, your warm hand grasp, your prayers and your very presence at the meetings, so far as possible, as well as give your money, and you will be blessed.

If our faith in God is not the veriest sham, it demands, and will produce, the abandonment sometimes, the subordination always, of external helps and material good.—Alexander Maclaren.

The Home

MY NEIGHBOR'S FIELD.

BY IDA WHIPPLE BENHAM.

I sowed my field with golden grain,
My neighbor sowed his field with rue;
And in the sun and in the rain
Leaf, flower and seed to harvest grew.
Singing I reaped the fruitful ears—
He gathered in his store with tears.

But when the second season smiled
In sun and dew and shining sheaf,
I found my chosen field defiled
All with the wild rue's self-sown leaf.
My bread was bitter for his deed,
Who gave the winds a worthless seed.

A great many people expect that a man after marriage will, as a matter of course, identify himself with his wife's family rather than his own. Mothers often feel this keenly, and wonder, in their loneliness, how their dear sons can forget them so readily. Have all the years of loving care and intimacy counted for nothing? If anything is said, the only consolation offered is the old couplet:

A daughter's a daughter all her life,
But a son's a son till he marries a wife.

Does the Fifth Commandment, then, apply only to daughters? Too many mothers could say as one lately did: "My married daughters write to me every week, and come home often, but I don't know much about my son. He has seldom written to me since his marriage, and he never writes much about himself or his affairs; lately he has left my letters for his wife to answer. He hasn't been home in two years." In the ideal marriage the wife wishes her husband to continue his love and devotion to his parents and old home, just as she does to hers. When this is not the case, something is wrong.

"The boarding house must go!" The words were said with emphasis at a woman's club, where the subject of homes for wage-earning women had been under discussion. An able paper was first read, showing the feasibility of a group of self-supporting girls uniting in the expenses of a home upon the co-operative plan. The obstacles to such a scheme were carefully considered and shown to exist more in imagination than in fact. One objection was the alleged difficulty of a household of women living together amicably in such close relations. But those who are actively engaged in business or professional pursuits learn, on this very account, to adapt themselves easily to all sorts of dispositions. Moreover, among the many nowadays who are earning their own living, there would be no difficulty in choosing one's household mates on the basis of congenial tastes and mutual interests. The experiment is being tried, here and there, on a small scale, but there are tokens, in large cities at least, of a more general movement in this direction. One advantage claimed is that business women would be likely to insist that these co-operative homes be administered on business principles.

Strangely do some people talk of "getting over" a great sorrow—overleaping it, passing it by, thrusting it into oblivion. Not so. No one ever does that, at least no nature which can be touched by the feeling of grief at all. The only way is to pass through the ocean of affliction solemnly, slowly, with humility and faith, as the Israelites passed through the sea. Then its very waves of misery will divide and become to us a wall on the right side and on the left, until the gulf narrows and narrows before our eyes and we land safe on the opposite shore.—D. M. Craik.

PEOPLE ONE CANNOT HELP.

BY MRS. MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Among the most difficult problems of life is the problem of the people one cannot help. We meet them constantly, the unclassified units who come under no designation familiar to our ears, whom organized charity cannot assist, who must themselves be made over before they can be gotten out of the Slough of Despond and started anew on their way. Some of them never fall into any Slough of Despond, and, indeed, would be more hopeful from our point of view if they did, since the cheerfully reckless person, who is content to be carried and does not resent dependence, is the most deplorable of all members of the social order.

It cannot be denied that in this world our chief business is to assist in the crises and scrambles of life those who are down, or who are going down. Nothing takes precedence of this. The man or woman who does most in the way of lending a hand to those in need of a hand is living most nearly the Christ life on earth. And the experience disheartening beyond every other is that of the one who discovers that there are people who cannot be helped. These persons are usually improvident and unthrifty, and sometimes they are extravagant, but often their difficulty is that they are wholly unsuited to their conditions and out of the groove where they properly belong.

A woman, for example, whose tastes and whose training, such as it has been, are purely domestic, who could successfully keep house if she would, oversee linen or silver in a hotel, assist the overburdened wife of a farmer in her daily work, or perform some useful manual labor, aspires to art or letters. She haunts the offices of newspapers, brings in her "stories" with pathetic insistence, grows wanner and thinner with her losing battle, and at last drops under the surface. She could not be helped in the single place where she was willing to stand because she was wholly unfitted for its requirements. Others saw this and delicately or roughly made it plain to her, but her own eyes were holden and she could not or would not see. Every such instance, and there are many, weighs one down with sorrowful sympathy when she makes the forlorn endeavor to help where help is out of the question.

On none do life's burdens press more heavily than on the widow with a growing family and aspirations for them beyond their natural position in life. I have in mind one woman who has bent her strong shoulders to the task of feeding, clothing and educating a family of five. Her husband was a laborer, and their home was and always has been in a not too comfortable, though quite respectable, tenement. A maid of all work before her marriage, this good woman goes out as laundress and housecleaner, and has her regular round of employers. Latterly she is breaking down and needs more leisure, she cannot safely work so many days a week. But she is sending Mary and Kitty through the normal school that they may become teachers and Lottie is to be apprenticed to a dressmaker, and not one of the three, though old enough to bring wages to the little home, is earning a penny. I cannot discover in the girls any reason why they should enter the profession of teaching beyond the American desire to rise in the social scale and their feeling that teachers are well paid and "have a long vacation"; they have no drawing toward it themselves. But to become somebody's neat second girl or lady's maid brings at the very thought a protest to their lips and a blush to their cheeks. Meanwhile, Patsey and Jimmy are running wild on the streets, mother slaves at the wash tub, the years go on and the family cannot be helped.

Of tough fiber and of sturdy common sense is the man who, being out of work, takes whatever he can get, with no distinction of the higher or the lower, and does it with his might. Such a man can always be helped, because he helps himself. But let us not disclaim our share of the responsibility for those among us who regard some kinds of effort as honorable and praiseworthy and look from a lofty plane on other departments as contemptible. All work, if honest work and well done, is equally deserving of recognition, and our petty discriminations are founded on fallacies. When a generally existing and healthful sentiment about this shall everywhere prevail, there will be fewer people whom one cannot help.

THE BEAUTY BLIND.

BY DELIA LYMAN PORTER.

Seven trees in front of a farmhouse, against each tree leaned a bicycle, from each bicycle had a fair rider just descended, to each rider there was a tongue, and each tongue vied with the others in praise. And well they might, for in all New England there was no such glorified, transfigured old farmhouse as this of Aunt Dotha's, to which these seven girls from Luddington were making their annual summer day visitation.

The house itself was old, the shingles gray with age, but such a blaze of color as it presented to the admiring eyes of every passer-by must be seen to be believed. On this July day the flowers were in their glory. Between all the windows were lattices covered with bright morning glories of every shade. Over the porches crept to the very roof wistaria vines, heavily laden with fragrant purple clusters. All around the base of the house, like a beautiful pedestal, was a tall border of brilliant sweet peas. In the windows were boxes of scarlet geraniums or vivid nasturtiums, and on either side of the little low front porch was a high stand of bright plants in pots. A row of sunflowers, concealing the adjoining woodshed, completed the gay picture.

"Aunt Dotha, you certainly have a wonderful eye for the beautiful," said Evelyn McCurdy, as the girls, after a delicious lunch, gathered around their dear old hostess in the cool little front sitting-room. They were rested and comfortable after their long, dusty ride and all ready, both in body and mind, for the "talk" which Aunt Dotha gave them each year, and to which they eagerly looked forward.

"Well," said Aunt Dotha, smiling, "I do love beauty, there's no denying that, and, oddly enough, you've struck the very thought I had in mind for our talk this afternoon. I don't want my girls to be among the many beauty blind people there are in the world. I well remember as I sailed for the first time over the beautiful lake of Lucerne there was a girl of about your age on the same steamer, whose eyes were not once lifted either to the snowy Alps above or the blue waters beneath, but were glued on to the pages of a yellow-covered novel. Her beauty blindness impressed me strongly.

"Now my text, if you want one, is a remark of Goethe's in words to this effect: 'Every day look at a beautiful picture, read a beautiful poem, listen to beautiful music, and if possible speak a few reasonable words.' At our breakfast table every day for years we have literally carried out the first two suggestions," continued Aunt Dotha, "and after dinner the third; as to the fourth I can't say so surely."

"How do you get your pictures and poetry at the breakfast table?" asked practical Martha Day.

"When Harriet, my niece, and I were in Europe we brought back hundreds of photographs, which lay untouched for years in the drawers of our high-boy till we thought of a changeable frame. The pictures were mounted on uniform cards, so we had a frame made just to fit, and with a wooden back held on by little wooden clamps, which made it possible to unfasten it and put in a new picture every day. It hangs in our dining-room and the pleasant memories and refreshing talk that daily changing art gallery has given us have been among our greatest pleasures."

"But how about the poetry," queried Ruth Adams.

"Under the picture is a little shelf on which lies a small book of poetry and we read a short poem every morning. We change the volume once a week, though we often take up the same poet again after a few weeks."

"As to the music," continued Aunt Dotha, "Harriet and I have regularly a twenty-minutes' concert all by ourselves as soon as the dinner dishes are washed. In the last two years we have only missed nine times. She sings a song and I play a bit of Beethoven or Schumann and three times a week we read part of a symphony in duet form by Beethoven, or Schubert, or perhaps some of the new Grieg music, which we get from the Luddington public library every fortnight."

"How stupid of me never to have thought of the public library," exclaimed Beth Hawkins, who was always lamenting her impecuniosity in not being able to buy all the new music she wanted to read.

"But to go back to the pictures, Aunt Dotha," said Martha. "We have no European photographs and I get so tired of the pictures on our dining-room walls."

"Then look out of your windows," said Aunt Dotha, "at the beautiful pictures there." For she well knew the fine groups of elm trees which adorned the grounds of Martha's home. "Multitudes of people are beauty blind to the outdoor pictures. I doubt if one in a hundred begins to take in the beauty visible on even a short walk in city or country. Take clouds, for instance. You remember Ruskin said the Lord might just as well have made a great black cloud come up once every three days to give us enough rain, letting us have the rest of the time a monotonous sky, instead of the glory of the clouds. Commit Shelley's poem, The Cloud, to heart and you will see that there is not an hour in the twenty-four in which some part of that poem does not describe the beauty of the sky. Then take trees, study their forms when they are etched against a clear winter sky. Sketch their limbs and branches, whether you are an artist or not, and see the beauty of the curves and lines. Then in summer study the beauty of the leaves. Get Edward Knobel's little book on The Trees and Shrubs of New England, and match the pictures of the leaves with real ones, until you know every tree in New England. Do the same with Mrs. Dana's How to Know the Wild Flowers, and you will find a new world of beauty on every hand."

"That reminds me of a rhyme I learned as a child," said Rhoda Sargent.

> "It's a beautiful earth and a beautiful sky,
> And to see it God gave us a heart and an eye."

"Yes," responded Aunt Dotha, "that's just it. But now a word about my second heading—the beautiful poetry Goethe wants us daily to read. I knew a theologue once who said he always had to read a little poetry every day to keep his soul alive, and I believe, furthermore, in committing to memory at least a verse every day. Learn Tennyson and Wordsworth, Matthew Arnold and Emerson, Shelley, Keats, Lowell and Whittier, and you will never regret it."

"But we haven't the time," said Betty Hazard, the busiest girl of all that busy set.

"Hear what Thoreau says," quoted Aunt Dotha. "'A broad margin of leisure is as beautiful in a man's life as in a book. Haste makes waste no less in life than in housekeeping. What are threescore years and ten hurriedly and coarsely lived to moments of divine leisure.' And I say, take the time to enjoy the beauty all around us. Let something else go—the teas, or the last magazine or the lecture—and leave some 'divine leisure' when, 'with eye made quiet by the power of harmony and the deep power of joy, we see into the life of things.'"

"I shall skip my third head—music," continued Aunt Dotha, after a little pause. "You need no urging on that score, but as to the fourth, the reasonable words, I am going to add a little to that—to speak your reasonable words in a beautiful manner. For there is a beautiful and an ugly way in which to say almost everything, and happiness depends on which way we take. You can upset a person for the whole day by the harsh way in which you may call him in the morning, or you may give him a beautiful start by the cheeriness of your greeting. And not only in words but in all the little, common courtesies and duties of life, think of the beautiful way of doing each. How much joy you may bring into the lives of all around you if you are keen to see and love the beauty, not only of nature and of books, but of manners and character."

As the seven bicycles sped along the shady lanes on their twilight return to Luddington, the world seemed a new one to many of those seven riders. It was as if scales had fallen from their beauty blind eyes. They rested a moment, half way home, on the crest of a hill from which was a beautiful view of Luddington and its sunset-reflecting harbor, while Evelyn repeated those immortal lines of Wordsworth:

> Nature never did betray
> The heart that loved her! she can so inform
> The mind that is within us, so impress
> With quietness and beauty and so feed
> With lofty thoughts, that neither evil tongues
> Nor greetings where no kindness is, nor all
> The dreary intercourse of daily life
> Shall e'er prevail against us, or disturb
> Our cheerful faith that all which we behold
> Is full of blessings.

ASHORE WITH YOUNG NATURALISTS.

SEASIDE ANIMALS.

BY PROF. WALTER M. RANKIN, PRINCETON UNIVERSITY.

Many years ago a wise teacher wished to take his pupils to the seashore where they could study together the interesting and curious creatures that live in the waters and on the shores of the ocean. So on a little island in Buzzard's Bay they started the first summer school for seaside study. Professor Agassiz did not live to carry out his plans, but long after his death one of his mottoes was still on the walls of the school, "Study nature, not books."

You will be glad enough, I think, to follow the last part of his advice now the long vacation has come, but how about the first part, can't we try that? Nowhere else does nature teach us so many interesting lessons as by the sea, and, if some of you are looking forward to a vacation time at the seashore, I want you to take a little course in nature for yourselves and see if it won't repay you. I will give a few hints which may be of service.

In the first place never mind the hard names. You may call your specimens what you will and yet have just as much pleasure with them; and I am sure you will soon be interested enough to get some wiser friend to help you with the names, or to tell you of some book where they may be found. If we omit the fish, nearly all the seashore animals belong to one of five classes, of which the crab, clam or snail, starfish, worm and sea anemone are examples. Knowing this you will be interested in looking for other examples of the same groups and in trying to find out how nearly they are related in form and habits.

Let us take the first of these groups. You all know what a crab looks like, or perhaps you have seen the big blue crab in the market. Now try to find some of his cousins. Among the rocks you may find a green, rough-looking fellow, the shore crab. Hiding under the stones and rockweed there may be the little dark mud crabs. If you are on a sandy shore you may find the funny little hermit crabs in their homes borrowed from the sea snails. Their habits will afford you no end of amusement. A curious fellow is the spider crab, which you will know by his pointed shell, on which he has the habit of fastening bits of seaweed, for he seems to like to decorate himself. I must not forget the fiddlers—crabs that are found near the water but do not live in it like the others. No more comical sight can be imagined than a great drove of them all scurrying to their burrows, each carrying his big claw like a fiddle before his face.

Related to the crabs, but very different in appearance, are the barnacles, whose shells you may find on the rocks. Unlike the higher animals they live a wandering life only when they are quite young and small, soon settling down to the quiet and protection of their shells. This list will give you an idea of the crab family, but there are many more, and you may find the summer too short to study their various forms and habits. Perhaps you will be fortunate enough to get one that is ready to shed its coat, and then you can find out for yourselves that when a crab's suit becomes too small for him he comes out of it and forms a new one which is a little larger and at first very thin and soft.

But the crab family is not the only interesting one. You will find some kinds of shellfish, such as the snails and clams, and if you watch closely you may learn something about the way they eat and move. The starfish you may find among the rocks in the pools when the tide is low. If you have never seen any but a dried starfish, you will wonder at the ease with which these curious animals twist themselves among the rocks, and by watching their hundreds of little feet you may see how they manage to move. Try to make the acquaintance of the sea anemone, for he is a near relative of the coral. Our common anemone is not very handsome, but if you carefully loosen him from the rocks and put him in a basin with water, he may spread out his delicate arms and consent to be fed with bits of raw meat.

Many of these animals may be kept in a simple aquarium, which you can easily arrange for yourself by using a large dish with plenty of sea water. You should put some of the green seaweed with the animals, as it helps to keep the water pure. Only remember that these creatures enjoy life, and, unless you care for them, it is better to leave them in their own homes. One thing more. You will find that in many ways your study will be more useful if you make notes of what you see and learn, and try to add sketches of your specimens. It will be good practice, and when you go home you will have something to show that will help you remember pleasantly the time spent at the seashore.

COLLEGE WOMEN IN THE COUNTRY TOWN.

In his baccalaureate sermon to the graduating class of Radcliffe College, Dean Hodges addressed himself particularly to the college woman in the country town, who is likely to find herself solitary and misunderstood, and in sore need of help in the hard task of making the most of things. After showing himself thoroughly in sympathy with the enthusiastic efforts of educated women for the betterment of the neighborhood, he points out certain mistakes they are in danger of making:

The first mistake is the unconscious assumption of a missionary attitude; as who should say, "Good people, I have come to teach and to reform you"; that offends human nature. No respectable person wants to be reformed. The young woman who makes her entrance into the country town, with her new manners and her new accent and her new gowns, and proposes summarily to amend the doings of people who were living there before she was born, has but her labor for her pains. The least taint of condescension will spoil the best intentions. Even the endeavor not to be condescending will be fatal. There must be perfectly sincere equality, giving and taking kept in even balance, the fact being frankly understood at the beginning that the college woman has as much to learn as she has to teach.

For a second mistake, which commonly underlies the first, is to assume that people are not well educated because they do not talk good grammar or because they do not care for poetry. That is but the arrogance of the literary classes. It depends upon the fallacy that all things that are really worth knowing are printed in books. The people who live in the white houses and behind the green blinds are not only ever so much more interesting than the college woman imagines, but they are also better educated than she foolishly thinks. They may not know so much as she does about the arbitrary relation between the noun and the verb, but they know a great deal more than she knows about matters much more valuable and vital. It depends upon the point of view. The college woman is at best but imperfectly informed. She can learn much more than she can teach. This second mistake is made, possibly, by a third —error as to the interests of the people. The initial thing is to understand that, because the college woman is interested in this or that, it does not follow that her neighbors will be interested in it. The right beginning is to find out what they are really interested in, and to start there.

Let the college woman, then, as a believer in the doctrine of the sisterhood of man, join with all proper humility and democracy in the life of the country town. Let her take the town just as she finds it, and study it in the light of her college lectures on sociology. She will find helpful and hopeful forces in it which she had not suspected. She will discover that there are already groups of good people who, under different circumstances, are doing what they can for the improvement of themselves and of the community. The right thing is to join quietly with them, and be patient. Much good work is spoiled and many opportunities are missed by going ahead too fast. The wagons of the country town may properly be hitched to a star, but not to a comet. The most fruitful service is that which is rendered in the spirit and the manner of the Master. . . . More and more, as the college woman interprets her privileges as opportunities, and tries to be of use in the neighborhood, she will realize that her usefulness depends upon herself, not upon what she has read in books and learned by heart, but upon what she is, upon her character, upon her personality. When she fails it will be for lack of that in herself which shall commend her truth to others, and when she succeeds it will not be so much by reason of her plans as on account of that subtle personal and spiritual element which inspires them.

ABOUT PEOPLE.

Helen Keller, the wonderful deaf, dumb and blind girl, is to enter the preparatory school for Radcliffe College at the beginning of the fall term.

One of Queen Victoria's favorite amusements while staying at her best beloved home, Balmoral, is to have family picnics. Dressed very plainly, like any unpretentious elderly woman of the middle class, she drives out with her daughters and granddaughters to a beautiful, shady, blossom-decked spot, and here, seated in a camp chair under a tree, she enjoys the lunch which is served to her and her party.

A New York woman, Mrs. Harriet Maxwell Converse, occupies the peculiar position of one of the chiefs of the United Tribes of the Six Nations, whose reservation lies in New York State and Canada. It was her devotion to the interests of their race that won the respect and affection of the Indians all over the country, who know her as the White Chief of the Iroquois, and the Indian name conferred upon her by them means "one who watches." Mrs. Converse is said to have the largest library in existence on subjects pertaining to the American Indians.

The late Kate Field was born a journalist and very early developed a taste for newspaper work. As a child, before she knew how to read and write, she was in the habit of cutting extracts from papers and pasting them into a scrap-book. Her mother was obliged to remonstrate with her for playing havoc with the family newspaper, telling her sternly that God would punish her if the offense were repeated. The next day Kate was found under a bed with newspaper and scissors. She explained to her mother that God could not see her under the bed and therefore could not punish her.

Closet and Altar

Prayers are to the soul what the dew of God is to the flowers. Why should not that gracious dew fall even now and always for all of us upon the fields of life?

Personal acquaintance with Christ is a living thing, like a tree that uses every hour for growth. It thrives in sunshine, it is refreshed by rain—even the storm drives it to fasten its grip more firmly in the earth for its support. So, troubled heart, in all experience, say, "This comes that I may make closer acquaintance with my Lord."

How unworthily of my immortality do I bear myself and how like a serf of time, when my impatience cannot wait a year for a result, a month for a reward or a week for a promised blessing! Thou dost not blame my ardent desires, dear Father. But with thee there is no fretfulness. Thou dost live in the successful eternity. Draw me there with thee, O thou Prince of peace and patience! By daily proofs of thy loving-kindness, by the unfolding of thy wise designs, by matchless surprises of joy, shame me from my distrust. Remind me that tomorrow holds thee, even as today, and holds, therefore, all of today's beauty and strength and joy. Teach me that thy postponement of happiness always enlarges it, if I will be enlarged by the delay. Convince thine impatient child that a thousand years of waiting for a blessing do not impair the blessing, because thou art not impaired. Grant me the faith that exults to be tested and the peace that is not in bondage to any event.—Amos R. Wells.

Let me not dwell so much within
My bounded heart, with anxious heed,
Where all my searches meet with sin,
And nothing satisfies my need—
It shuts me from the sound and sight
Of that pure world of life and light,
Which has no breadth or length or hight.

Let me thy power, thy beauty, see;
So shall the hopeless labor cease,
And my free heart shall follow thee
Through paths of everlasting peace.
My strength thy gift—my life thy care—
I shall forget to seek elsewhere
The wealth to which my soul is heir.
—Anna L. Waring.

Ever-loving God, to thy bosom thy tired children come for rest. Some of us sorely need thee; we have been disappointed many times today, disappointed in things that we thought would yield us profit and satisfaction, disappointed because the cisterns that we have hewn out for ourselves have not given th water needed to quench our thirst. Nothing beneath these skies can satisfy the hearts which thou hast made for thyself. O Fountain of Living Water! of thee let us drink. O Bread of Life! of thee let us eat. O Light of Life! shine upon our hearts that pine for the summer of thy love. All thy blessed saints who gather round thee in the world where night never comes find in thee their true consummation and bliss. Be to us something of what thou art to them, and let us find a foretaste of our inheritance. O Lamb! who art in the midst of the Throne, but who treadest the rough path of this world with each trembling heart, be our Shepherd and bring us to thy marriage supper when the mystery of time and sin is finished. Amen.

Mothers in Council.

LITTLE PEOPLE IN THE PARLOR.

Do we realize how often children are allowed to be present when callers are introduced, either to annoy people by their frequent interruptions, to show off their precocities, or, what is worse, to overhear, and by no means intelligently, conversation beyond their years? Few mothers comprehend how exceedingly alert is a young child's mind, how widely receptive it is, or how retentive. Impressions produced unconsciously do much to form the growing character, and it is important to keep children from those influences which, by hurrying them towards maturity, tend to make them more self-conscious, more worldly-wise and consequently less childlike.

A lover of children bemoaned to me the fact that nowadays there seem to be no young girls; they spring from their childhood into young ladyism, losing the sweetest and most attractive period of gradual development into womanhood. What lovelier creature lives than the shy, sweet, modest girl of thirteen or fourteen, no longer a child, not yet a woman, but with a dignity and reserve all her own; having opinions, yet loath to announce them, unaffected, natural, enthusiastic and as yet with no foolish sentiments about "boys"? Yet how often this is missed, and we find girls of that age disdaining to wear their hair in braids, adopting the latest fashions in sleeves and skirts and simpering over love letters. Mothers look on and sigh, saying how astonishing it is that Mary has suddenly become a young lady and will have her dresses made her own way, not realizing that they are largely responsible for the rapid and much to be regretted transition from childhood.

Small things, which in themselves seem immaterial, are large factors in influencing character, and one of these small things which many mothers ignore is allowing children to be present when friends or acquaintances call. A sensible mother who has brought up two girls and a boy once said to me: "I never allow my children to be in the room when I have callers unless they are expressly asked for. I think they hear much that they are better off without hearing." In consequence of this and other wise regulations these children remained children long after others of the same age assumed the attributes of young ladies and young men, and all who met them were delighted with their modesty, their unconsciousness and charming manners.

It seems a reflection upon the intelligence and good judgment of women to imply that the casual conversation at afternoon calls, formal or informal, is anything but elevating, but if one will but look back over one's own experience and think how often topics are introduced which are beyond the understanding of children, or should be—discussions of the freshest newspaper scandal, bits of neighborhood gossip, opinions concerning the latest fashions, criticism of the management of local societies, disparaging remarks about certain members of the community—it will be seen that such things are, to say the least, not elevating to a child's mind, nor likely to impress it with a very high estimate of the world and its inhabitants. And if the children are allowed to join in the conversation, self-importance and self-consciousness are often developed.

Have you not seen many times a young child sitting beside its mother, or hanging about her neck with eyes wide open and with ears pricked up, absorbing with keenest interest this grown-up talk. And how often it is erroneously repeated to the harm of someone. Children get things very much mixed up; they put bits of information together until they build up a marvelous structure, often unrecognizable. But sometimes they report things only too literally. A small boy once heard his mother say to a friend that her next-door neighbor had such a homely carpet it made her ill to look at it. Soon after he went to the neighbor's door, rang the bell and asked to step into the parlor. The maid let him in and thinking he had some message for her mistress sent the lady down. She found the boy looking intently about, and on asking him what he had come for was considerably taken aback by hearing him say, "O, nothing—only my mother said your carpet made her sick to her stomach, and I wanted to see just how homely it was!"

So many mothers have just such literal-minded, truthful boys that no one will be surprised to hear that the foregoing is a true story. But if this particular Johnny had not been in the parlor, had been instead blowing bubbles in the play-room, playing baseball in the fields or reading in the sitting-room, his mother had not been forever mortified in the presence of her next-door neighbor, and Johnny would not have learned to criticise other people's belongings.

Many a person has a memory of a pleasant call interrupted by the importunity of a persistent child who demanded its mother's attention and the hopeless air "mamma" assumed, until the visitor felt it a kindness to leave abruptly, but the effect upon the child is by all means the most important objection to its presence in the reception-room. We may be able to choose our own words when children are within hearing, but we cannot be responsible for our callers. Youth is too short to have any of it thrown away. It is the duty, then, of parents, to preserve it for their children as far as is possible, and one way in which to do this is to keep children with children, not too much with other people, and, above all, not to encourage them in helping mamma entertain company. L. T. E.

THE FIRST READING LESSONS.

Rival methods, old and new, of teaching to read continue to be discussed; but after all the most fortunate children are those who have learned to read, almost as unconsciously as they learned to talk, at home. They pick up their letters before they know it from the blocks with which they are playing. Somebody says, "Let's have some fun making words," and the effect is magically different from that of saying, "I'm going to give you a lesson."

Then such a child is amused by being read to; mother, aunt, father, elder sister, some one will be at his service and read by the hour, the child sitting on the reader's lap and overlooking the page the while. He associates those funny letters with something pleasant—reading is play. But if the association is with a primer and a blackboard and having to sit still—reading is work. Do you remember Tom Sawyer's experience in getting the fence whitewashed, and that his biographer draws the moral that a thing is work or play according as you have to do it or do it from choice?

A little girl of five has a picture-book of The Night Before Christmas. It has been read over and over to her until she knows it by heart. Sometimes she takes the book and "reads" herself, "just like mamma." She rattles off the lines, looking at the print the while and keeping pace quite accurately with it, for the pictures of Santa Claus and the reindeer and the stockings and the "wild leaves" are landmarks, and she keeps asking, "Time to turn over?" When she winds up triumphantly with she knows a hundred words by sight while she might have laboriously learned a dozen at school. Of course spelling lessons must supplement this sort of sight reading when schooltime does come.

A large majority of children are never read to at home because no one has time, but a child whose mother can read to him but never does is clearly defrauded of his just rights. It is an irreparable loss. There is a movement on foot to provide a better class of children's nurses through training schools. It would be a good idea to make reading aloud easily part of the course. How many nurses could keep children amused by reading to them? How many, indeed, read to themselves enough to be able to repeat stories, and how many mothers would gladly pay for one who could? H. F. L.

To be always receiving the teachings of experience and the vitality of nature and giving them back in one's habitual occupation is to establish a true harmony between one's self and one's task.—H. W. Mabie.

The Conversation Corner.

MY DEAR CORNERERS: It is a new thing to have three pictures all at once in the Corner, and that from a country we have, I think, never heard from before. We have correspondents in Europe, Asia and Africa, but I do not know that we have a single member in our neighboring republic of Mexico. Perhaps these two children would like to join! But let us read the letter which comes with the pictures:

Dear Mr. Martin: I suppose you have followed, as I have done, the journeyings of the great "Commission" which Chicago sent around the world, by reading its story and looking at its pictures in Harper's Weekly. Why should not The Corner have its "World's Transportation Commission" and its special correspondents and artists? Perhaps D. F. will consent to insert our illustrations—although if we send them he must not cut off the head of one and the tail of another as may suit his convenience, in the way that he treats some of your sentences! I will start off as "Special Commissioner" to Mexico, and hope others will send you reports from countries farther away, or perhaps even here at home curious means of conveyance may be noted and described, and, better still, pictures sent of them. I would like to submit two reports, if you will allow me.

This one calls attention to three very different methods of conveyance among the Mexicans. The Mexican children, like the Japanese, have to tend and carry "the baby." How they do it my first picture shows. I suppose a baby carriage among native Mexicans would be an unheard-of curiosity.

For carrying heavy loads the ox cart is universally used. The most curious thing about the cart is the wheel, which is made just as it was hundreds of years ago. Notice that the larger part of it is hewn out of a large huge plank, and the circle completed by two curved pieces of wood, one on each side.

The last picture is one that belongs especially to the city of Mexico. The streets there are very bad, the cemeteries are a long distance in the suburbs, the people are poor, and the street railway systems very good. Hence the funeral procession is usually a string of horse or mule cars, and the one carrying the casket is of the sort you see here. Some, however, are much finer than this, which is of the second class. W.

On inquiry at the office of the Boston gentleman, who so modestly signs himself, I find that he had really been in Mexico and had taken the pictures himself; also, that not long after his return he started off again on a tour to Europe in The Congregationalist's Pilgrimage Party. I hope he will send us snap-shots of any other curious conveyances which he takes—only please let them be something that makes a little quicker time than these from Mexico! One thing, however, he must frankly understand—these pictures, received before the publication of our prize offer in June 25, cannot be candidates for that award.

Just as I wrote the last words above, I heard the sound of revelry at Squirrel's Rocks, not far from my house, and remembered that I had been invited to a "five o'clock tea" at that place. Of course I went. It was really an out-of-door picnic in a romantic place—close beside a pond, on the rocks, under a clump of oak trees. When I arrived the children were playing games near by. I wish Mr. W. had been there with his kodak—he would have found something moving faster than an ox team, as we played "Curt'sy," or "Go-dar"! Nor had the children lost all their activity when called back to the Rocks, where the kind ladies had spread the lunch, or as they gathered sticks and leaves to make the bonfire which burned up the pasteboard boxes—the "twa dogs" looked after what food was left!

This ought to have been among the Cambridge letters of Fourth of July week—for was not Gen. Robert A. the hero who held Fort Sumter in 1861?

CORNER SCRAP-BOOK.

First Carriage in Maine. The Lewiston Journal says it was owned by Rev. Francis Winters of Bath, the first settled minister there. His wife was Abigail Alden, a descendant of John and Priscilla, and so a distant cousin of many of our readers. In making a journey to Connecticut in 1771, she got tired of riding on horseback, and Mr. Winters exchanged one of the horses for a chaise. On their return to Maine two Negroes had to be employed to cut down the trees and clear the road. If this ancient vehicle, with its leather thorough-braces and wooden springs, could be photographed for our page, it would doubtless rival Mr. W.'s Mexican conveyances for beauty and speed! Is it possible that any of our Bath members could find the relic, or did it, like Holmes's "one-hoss shay," on its centennial anniversary in 1871, go Family Rank of College Boys. Looking at the catalogue of Harvard University to find in what year Francis Winters, the Bath minister, graduated, I notice that the students' names were not then in alphabetical order, as now. Do our readers know that in our American colleges, prior to the Revolution, pupils were graded in their classes and seated in their classrooms according to the real or alleged social rank of their fathers? In 1765 the names of Sparhawk, Hooper, Oliver and Winthrop take the lead, and Winters is found at about the middle of the list. The students—and their fathers too—were very tenacious of their rights in those days, and one excellent and honored man complained to the president that his son was placed below the son of another gentleman, who was not made Justice of the Peace until two years, and Justice of the Quorum until one year, after he himself was appointed to those offices! But the rising spirit of "free and equal" rights changed that, and from 1773 the names in Harvard College were arranged in alphabetical order. At Yale they were so arranged from 1768. Of course, hereditary ability and standing stood for much then as now, to the advantage of the sons, but in no such way as to handicap the effort of persevering sons, without such advantage, to make something of themselves. If Abraham Lincoln's name had been on a college catalogue, it would, no doubt, have stood at the very end of the list, so far as social standing was concerned, but lo, now it leads all the rest!

What Children Say About Feet. "The stairs are awful heavy, papa," said one, as he dragged his up to bed one night.

This is a revised version by another of what Eli said to Samuel in the Bible story: "Go wite back to bed, Samuel; you'll get cold standin' there in you' bare feet."

The mother said to Edna, "Go back, go back." "I tarn't," she said, "I tarn't, my feet won't let me."

The above are from the Overlook, a bright little children's paper issued by the Hyde Park church, several of the contributors being Cornerers. To these I add the saying of an Irish boy as he waded to school in winter: "The snow was so deep, I was up to my knees, before ever my feet got there!"

LESSON FOR JULY 19. 2 Sam. 6: 1-12.

THE ARK BROUGHT TO JERUSALEM.

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D. D.

When David had been made king over all Israel he captured Jerusalem and made it the political center of his kingdom by planting his throne there. Then, some six years after, he made it the religious center by placing the ark of God there. This act was the cause of movements in which the presence and power of God appear, shedding light on his character and will as related to us. We find in this lesson four great facts in human experience:

1. A revival of religion. The ark was to the Israelites the one symbol of the presence of Jehovah, who had made a covenant with his people based on the tables of the law which were within it. While that covenant was being willfully broken there was no place of honor in Israel for the ark. When the Philistines took it away, the favoring presence of God disappeared from Shiloh and from the nation. His presence in wrath and judgment was intolerable. The Philistines could not endure it, and therefore they sent the ark back to Israel. But it proved a curse to the people to whom it first came, because they were not ready for it. They said, "Who is able to stand before the Lord, this holy God?" [1 Sam. 6: 20.] It was not taken back to Shiloh, nor to Nob, whither perhaps the tabernacle had been transferred. It was simply put away in a private house, and there it remained undisturbed for two generations. Samuel had first learned about Jehovah beside the ark, but he never sought it to inquire of God, neither did Saul [1 Chron. 13: 3]. During all Saul's reign, which ended in disaster, the people were not ready for the ark.

But when the tribes came together under one ruler and the national spirit grew strong within them, they sought again after God. Then David, who wished to rule them in the fear of the Lord, longed to bring back Jehovah, their rightful king and his, in his fullness. He consulted every leader [1 Chron. 13: 1]. He meant, by bringing the ark to Jerusalem, to re-establish national religious worship. It was a grand popular demonstration, most effective in uniting the people. It was the dawning of a new day for Israel.

What does this mean for us? It means that when those whose worldliness and sin have shut God out of their lives turn to him with all their hearts he comes back to them. Even to such the nobler life of communion with the King of kings is possible. But those who want God must, like the Israelites, go after him; must go with undisguised and earnest desire. The disordered life must be conformed again to obedient service. He who has known the presence of God, has missed it and wants it again, will not wait idly and long for holy feeling. He will again go regularly to church, to the prayer meeting and to his private hour of prayer. He will prepare himself as a tabernacle for the Spirit of God to dwell in and seek for his coming.

2. A disaster through want of reverence. Does it seem a little thing that the people neglected to observe the directions of God for removing the ark? It was not willful opposition. It was simply thoughtlessness. But in that spirit they never could have gained the blessing which they sought from God's presence. To those who have no reverence there is no real sense of God. What would the ark have been to Israel without the recognition of its sacredness and of his infinite dignity whom they believed was dwelling in it? How could it impress the people with the unapproachable majesty of God if they handled it like any common furniture? When it was made the law was given that only one family of Levites should carry it, and that they should not touch it on pain of death [Num. 4: 15]. The men of Bethshemesh had been smitten for looking into it. Yet in their unbalanced enthusiasm David and the people went to fetch the ark of God without consulting their law or their history, without thinking who God was. If Uzzah had not fallen how could the people have gained the one blessing they desired and needed? Can one enjoy God without knowing him or know him without worshiping him?

Perhaps there is no more common evidence of vital defect in character in these days than irreverence in handling sacred things. Those who bear God's name, and speak irreverently of their calling and their work, who assume sacred office in the church and carelessly live lives inconsistent with their office, who display irreverent familiarity with God, commit the sin of Uzzah. Christians who believe God's day to be holy, but lightly excuse themselves when they find it inconvenient to treat the day as holy, put their hands where Uzzah put his. The punishment comes to them also —not in physical death, but in that loss of the holiest sense of God which issues in spiritual death, the supreme disaster of life.

3. A home blessed by the presence of God. Many of life's richest blessings come unsought, but they do not come to those who are unprepared. Obed-edom did not ask for the ark. But for the sins of others he would never have got it. David did not send it to his house as a favor. As soon as David found that it proved a blessing, he took it away.

But Obed-edom was ready for it. He was fitted by inheritance to receive it. But that was not enough to prepare him for it. Abinadab had housed it for seventy years, but we hear of no especial blessing coming to him through it. Yet Obed-edom had not sheltered it three months before it became generally known that good fortune had come to him through the ark. Just what blessings he received we do not know, but they were of the kind that every one wanted. They must have come because his spirit pleased God.

Then the ark, the symbol of God's presence, was brought only to one home in Israel. But now the evidences of his presence may be welcomed in every home, and to plant homes where God dwells is the greatest service we can render to mankind and to his kingdom. The privilege of entertaining the ark of God is offered to each soul. "Know ye not that your body is a temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you, which ye have from God?" But there is a peculiar sense in which the home receives him. Marriage is not only a privilege, but a service to God. To form homes in which to receive him is among the highest of all duties. Homes from which family worship daily arises from hearts that love him; in which children are desired and, when received, are reared for his service; homes where his word, his will and his day are honored, receive his richest blessings, the fame of which goes forth to the world.

4. The nation blessed by honoring God. When the blessing to the house of Obed-edom became known every household wanted it, David most of all. He wanted it for the whole nation, which he learned that he must purify, and his own heart also, to receive what he so much desired. He and his people also learned that, while God holds in one hand a blessing, he holds in the other a curse. With watchful care they studied his law. With reverent hearts they built a place for him to dwell in. With obedient spirits they carried out fit arrangements to bring the ark to Jerusalem. They made God and his dwelling place the center of the nation. And the blessing which had come to the house of Obed-edom spread through all Israel. Her borders were enlarged. Her fields yielded rich harvests. Her people grew wiser and gentler. Her king sang praises to God in inspired strains. God, welcomed back, made Israel great among the nations.

What God was to Israel he will be to our country, and more; and every home that welcomes him makes his presence more desired by the nation and more honored in it.

PROGRESS OF THE KINGDOM.

DR. WHEELER IN AMERICA.

We are glad to give our readers this week a portrait of one of the oldest and most esteemed of our Turkish missionaries, Rev. Crosby H. Wheeler, D. D., the founder and for many years the able president of Euphrates College, Harpoot. Three years ago his increasing feebleness made it necessary to give up active work, and last week he returned in company with his wife and daughter, as well as with Rev. O. P. Allen and family—Mr. Allen's wife is a sister of Dr. Wheeler—to spend his declining years in this country. The long voyage of two months was a fairly comfortable one, and Dr. Wheeler's friends hope that, though he is very feeble and has passed by three years the age of threescore and ten, change of climate and skillful medical attendance will greatly benefit him. He is now at Auburndale and will remain there for the present.

OUR OWN WORK.

A Generous Gift to the A. B. C. F. M. For a long time the American Board has been trying to make its constituents realize the needs of the North China College at Tung-cho, of the International Institute for Girls at San Sebastian, Spain, and of various other institutions whose growth renders their present buildings and resources wholly inadequate to their opportunity of service. It is with profound gratitude therefore that the announcement is made of the receipt of a legacy of $55,000 from the estate of Mrs. C. L. A. Tank of Fort Howard, Wis., which shows that the urgent calls have not been unheeded. Of this sum $35,000 are for the present needs and endowment of North China College, one of our most important and most needy institutions, $5,000 are for the Tank Chapel and Bridgman School at Peking, $5,000 for the Williams Hospital at Pang-chuang, $2,500 for International Institute for Girls and $500 for Euphrates College. The remaining $4,500 are to be devoted to general work in papal lands, Mexico and the city of Prague being particularly mentioned.

Recent News from Turkey. From nearly every station in Asia Minor comes word of the breaking down of old prejudices on the part of the Gregorian Armenians and of friendly relations between them and the evangelical Christians. The letters of our missionaries tell of special religious interest on the part of all classes of Turkish Christians. At Adabazar and Bardezag a meeting for prayer in behalf of their suffering fellow-countrymen was attended by crowds such as had never before been seen in those communities. A vartabed and a priest took part in one of the services in Bardezag. The Bardezag High School and the Adabazar Girls' School were reported to be crowded with pupils. Dr. Barnum of Harpoot wrote recently: "The doors are open to us everywhere. Our chapels are crowded. Some of the Gregorians who have been most bitterly opposed seem very much touched and softened. There are few places where one could not preach. The calls come from every direction for teachers and preachers, but where are the laborers?" Dr. Fuller of Aintab reports that on the first of May the sanitary condition of Zeitoun and Marash was gradually improving, the death rate at Zeitoun being only five or six instead of forty per day. Mr. Chambers of Erzroom, writing in regard to relief work, says that so far from the necessity of aid being over, as had been said in this country, the Armenians in the interior will not be able to support themselves until the harvest of 1897, even should all things be favorable. He estimates that one dollar will afford a dole of bread for one person for three months or to nearly 100 for one day. From Van we learn that thousands of villagers are still flocking into the city in search of food, while business is almost at a standstill.

THE WORLD AROUND.

Outbreak in Madagascar. The Malagasy have not submitted to French occupation without some outbreaks of lawlessness, and we regret to learn from a recent letter of Rev. James Sibree in The Independent and Nonconformist that the chief leader of one of the most serious disturbances is a young man educated at the Friends' High School, who was for some time a preacher and apparently earnest in promoting church work. What began as a marauding movement in the province of Anàlakèly developed into an anti-foreigner and anti-Christian uprising which soon assumed alarming proportions. Large assemblies were held and five points were laid down which it was agreed should be enforced: No Christian worship, no schools, no road repairing, no serving as soldiers and restoration of idolatry, charms, etc. It was decided that Christian preachers and teachers should be killed, and the L. M. S. evangelists were obliged to flee for their lives. It is thought that about twenty village churches were destroyed near Anjòzorobè, and a northern group of churches and schools, about forty in number, have been entirely broken up. The women and children have fled southward or towards the forests, and the men are terrorized into complying, outwardly at least, with the rebels. But Mr. Sibree is assured that not a fourth part of the people have any real sympathy with the rebellion, and incidents of friendliness toward the evangelists and faithfulness of some adherents under persecution prove that the missionary work is not an utter failure. In the capital itself there is much cause for encouragement, for both schools and churches have been larger than ever before, and a great C. E. convention held in the spring brought together 1,300 or 1,400 enthusiastic young Christians.

A Bombshell in the Scottish Fold. In his address at the Free Church of Scotland Assembly, recently held in Edinburgh, the new moderator, Rev. Dr. William Miller of the Madras Christian College not only shocked his conservative fellow-countrymen by airing some of his radical theological views, but made some astounding statements in regard to Indian missionary work, which will probably be bitterly resented and which are not likely to awaken missionary enthusiasm. Dr. Miller alleged that the home churches have been grievously misled by their Indian missionaries. Converts have been made, he said, but not because they desired spiritual blessings, but freedom from crushing burdens, elevation in the social sphere and many good things of the world. He accused the missionaries of allowing a false impression to get abroad and makes the matter worse by trying to excuse them in these words: "No doubt their temptation to silence was a strong one. They knew how important it was that their work should be maintained. They knew that if it were regarded as a spiritual work all effort to maintain it would be gladly made; they knew, or thought they knew, that if the church learned how small the spiritual leaven in the whole lump was, if it learned how the thoughts of those who had gathered round them were almost wholly still of land and bullocks and wages and cases in the law courts, then their own efforts would be reckoned worthless and the good they had done be allowed to languish and pass away. It was not so very wonderful that for the sake of a work which they knew to be of God they should hold their peace while false impressions gained too wide currency."

PEN AND SCISSORS.

The London Missionary Society has been successful in raising its centenary fund to over $500,000.

We rejoice to see the broad spirit manifested by The Missionary Herald in scheduling a home missionary program for its August topic for missionary concerts.

The English Church Missionary Society reports 7,000 adult baptisms during the past year, of which nearly 3,000 were in Uganda. Its total annual receipts amounted to the enormous sum of $1,305,700, but its expenses exceeded these figures by $85,000.

In Oberlin on June 23, the corner stone of Judson Cottage was laid with appropriate ceremonies. This home for the children of missionaries will be a source of comfort to many anxious parents when called upon to endure the trial of separation from their children at an age when the boys and girls most need the influence of a Christian home. There is no more practical way of expressing appreciation of our missionaries than by contributing towards the sum still needed for the completion of the building and for its endowment.

In an article in The Church at Home and Abroad Dr. B. C. Atterbury characterizes Li Hung Chang's visit to Europe and America as "China's new embassy to the West," and bespeaks for the noted statesman a cordial welcome in this country. Dr. Atterbury writes: "It will indeed be unfortunate if he, the first really great Chinaman to travel abroad, returns to his home, as too many Orientals have done, confirmed in the belief that while some Western nations have made great progress in scientific lines, yet morally and socially nothing is to be learned from them. This sad result with other travelers has come partly from the fact that as they have passed from country to country they have been received by a class of society which takes too little interest in pointing out what is of value from the Christian standpoint."

At the thirteenth Commencement of Gates College Pres. G. W. Hinman preached the baccalaureate. The young people's societies of the town were addressed by Sec. H. E. Wells of the Y. M. C. A. of Chadron. The graduating class numbered eight, including all departments. The members of the graduating class of '95, who refused to receive their diplomas, alleging that the management had lowered the standards of the college, appeared and received them from President Hinman. Rev. S. C. Haskins of Chicago gave the master's oration on Twentieth Century Education, after which the degree of A. M. was conferred on him and on Rev. D. R. Collings, Fairview, Cal. The attendance during the year has been 164, of which number 115 were enrolled during the spring term, making this the largest attendance in the spring term ever known. President Hinman remains with the college. The trustees reported that the financial condition had greatly improved and that if the present management could be relieved of the incubus of $9,000 debt, received as an inheritance, all running expenses could be met.

BOOK REVIEWS.

Christianity in History, by Adolph Harnack, translated with the author's sanction by Thomas Bailey Saunders. This essay, first delivered as a lecture before the Berlin branch of the Evangelical Union, deals with the relation of Jesus Christ to the development of history and the problems of modern thinking.

Professor Harnack first draws the contrast between the naturalism of Lessing and Rousseau, who taught that man had nothing to learn from history, and the theory of evolution which forms the basis of all the thinking of today. He raises and answers the three great questions of the modern unbelief. First of all is the objection that "the Christian religion is a part of history, and consequently of that development of which all history consists, and is no more than a link in that development; and therefore its founder cannot hold any peculiar or unique position." The second objection is that "even though the founder of the Christian religion may have been an incomparable man, he lived many centuries ago, and it is therefore impossible to go to him with our troubles and sorrows and lay hold of him as the rock of our life; it is not a person whom we have any longer to consider, but the doctrine and the principle." The third objection is that "we may speak of Jesus Christ as we will, and he may have been all we say, but that we cannot be certain of it, for where our idea of him has not been destroyed by historical criticism it has been rendered doubtful; and even though it were more trustworthy than it is, still the facts in history can never be known with a certainty that would entitle us to make them the foundation of our religious belief."

Difficult as the problem is, and all the more so because of the brevity of the lecture, Professor Harnack's answer to these objections seems to us sufficient and satisfactory, and we commend the lecture for its reverence, faith and logic to those whose faith has been unsettled by the agnostic philosophy of our time. The body of the book is more orthodox in tone and spirit than the introduction and the original than the translation, good as this latter generally is, Mr. Saunders often contriving to make the English equivalent of Professor Harnack's theological terms mean less than they do in the original in the way of committing the argument to the evangelical position and view of our Lord's person and work. For example, "self revelation" is made "revelation," and "certainty" "reality," in places where the whole sense is changed for the worse. For those especially who think that only evil comes from German thinking we recommend this argument, even in its somewhat weakened form, to careful consideration. [Macmillan & Co. 80 cents.]

BIOGRAPHY.

The Life and Letters of Charles Bulfinch, Architect, edited by his granddaughter, Ellen Susan Bulfinch, with an introduction by Charles A. Cummings. The present is a fitting time for the appearance of this sumptuous book, the battle for the preservation of the best known work of the famous Boston architect whose life it chronicles, the façade of the Massachusetts State House, having been for the moment won. It is not upon the artistic side alone, however, that the story is of interest. Charles Bulfinch was an eminent and honored citizen, and "for twenty years, as chairman of the selectmen, he stood at the head of the town government of Boston." The book gives abundant material of interest to the lovers of history in pictures of the life of old New England, and especially of Boston. The change that has come over the habits of the people, and the differences between Massachusetts and Connecticut, is strikingly illustrated, for instance, by a letter from Fairfield, Ct., where Mr. Bulfinch arrived with a party in 1789, on his way to the inauguration of Washington, and found that he would not be allowed to proceed on Sunday.

It is upon his work as architect, however, that Mr. Bulfinch's fame must rest, and here he occupies a notable and conspicuous position. The State House at Boston is his chief monument, but to him, also, we owe the terraced front and much of the construction of the Capitol at Washington. In the march of improvement many of his buildings have been destroyed or rebuilt, but all that remain are marked by the same beauty of proportion, simplicity and reserve in the use of ornament—qualities much needed in our more pretentious later work. He began in a time when there were neither architects nor schools of architecture in America, and his work has hardly been surpassed in dignity and beauty of proportion since. How meager the resources at his command were, and how little art atmosphere existed in America just after the Revolution, Miss Bulfinch clearly shows.

The illustrations of the book are admirable and the ordering of the material successful, and the book is a real addition to our knowledge of the beginnings of our national history. [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $5.00 net.]

Maria Mitchell, Life, Letters, and Journals is a memorial of exceptional interest, not only to the friends and pupils of this eminent astronomer, but to all interested in the attainments of women. After reading of her childhood and home life on lonely Nantucket, our first thought is that, with such surroundings, she couldn't help being an astronomer. Then we notice that out of eight children it was Maria on whom the father depended for assistance in all his studies of the heavens, and we feel sure that her natural gifts were unusual. There was no school in the world, at that time, where she could be taught astronomy, but she needed none. She early caught her father's enthusiasm, and together they spent every clear night "sweeping" the heavens. Before she was thirty she had been awarded a gold medal for the discovery of a telescopic comet, and had been elected a member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences—an honor given to no other woman. As one of the first women to attain eminence in science, she was introduced to many of the distinguished people of the age, both in Europe and America, and she records her impressions of them in a characteristic and interesting manner. The chapters of her experiences as professor of astronomy at Vassar College are of especial value to the hundreds of women, scattered throughout the land, who, as unformed girls, received an inspiration from this strong, yet tenderly sympathetic, woman. [Boston: Lee & Shepard. $2.00.]

In the series, Women of Colonial and Revolutionary Times, we have Dolly Madison, by Maud Wilder Goodwin. The life of so famous and attractive a woman as the wife of our fourth President could hardly fail to be of interest, while Mrs. Goodwin's entertaining style and thorough familiarity with the age make the volume a fascinating one. Mrs. Madison was far removed from the "new woman" of today, and her letters rarely touched upon politics, although her public life covered nearly half a century and the administrations of nine presidents. Yet from her Quaker girlhood, through her years of influence, social prominence and gayety, to her death, which brought out such a funeral procession as has honored no other woman, the story of Dolly Madison gives us a vivid picture of the domestic and social life of the nation through a period of wonderful change and growth. [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.25.]

BIBLICAL STUDY.

In Heroes of Faith Burris A. Jenkins, D. B., has given us a study of a chapter from the Greek New Testament for beginners, introduced by Professor Thayer. It is a thorough study of the eleventh chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews, with an interlinear translation of the original, supplemented by the King James and Revised Versions, and full notes, maps and indices. An interesting essay treats of this chapter as found in literature, with full quotations. The whole book is admirably planned and executed, and we commend it for private study as well as for classes. [Funk & Wagnalls Co. 75 cents.]

The People's Bible History. Edited by Rev. George C. Lorimer, LL. D., with maps and illustrations. Mr. Gladstone's good nature in commenting upon and introducing other people's books is well known. He has given in this case a full general introduction, containing an elaborate argument for the conservative position in regard to Bible criticism, in which he seems to us to have added little or nothing to the value of the book. There are advantages and disadvantages in a volume made up, as this is, from the work of different authors. One disadvantage is that men who occupy entirely different positions are at liberty to contradict each other, as Professor Sayce and Professor Curtis do in regard to the question of higher criticism in the first and second essays of the book. Dean Farrar, Rev. F. W. Gunsaulus, Dr. Pentecost, Dr. MacArthur, Rev. Martyn Summerbell, Rev. W. T. Moore, the editor of the London Christian Commonwealth, Rev. Edward Everett Hale, Professor Beet, Prof. Caspar René Gregory, William Cleaver Wilkinson, Rev. J. Monroe Gibson and Dr. Lorimer himself are some of the other writers. The work makes no pretension to treat the matters discussed in a way to hold the attention of scholars, and seems to us quite too rhetorical and diffuse in places, but it is interesting and reverent and will, no doubt, be of great use in many homes through what we may call its homiletic quality, interpreting the moral and religious suggestions of the Bible. A glance at the index will show how popular and discursive the style of the book really is. We cannot wholly commend the illustrations, most of which are process plates after pictures of the second class, including far too many of Bida's somewhat wooden illustrations of Scripture characters. [Henry O. Shepard Co. $15.00.]

TRAVEL.

On Snow-Shoes to the Barren Grounds, by Caspar Whitney. The Indians of the far north of our own continent go to the region between Alaska, Hudson's Bay and the Arctic Ocean in summer to hunt the musk ox and wood bison, but Mr. Whitney made his expedition in winter with dog teams and snowshoes. A region of treeless plains, covered with moss on which the musk oxen feed, it deserves its name of the Barren Grounds, and only a genuine search for adventure and desire of exploration in the least known country of the world could have tempted a traveler thither. Something of this spirit of adventure the author succeeds in carrying over to the reader, who may indeed be pardoned if he gives thanks that the experiences of semi-starvation, bitter cold and extreme fatigue did not fall to his own lot, while he admires the pluck and intrepidity of the author and is thankful that he got home alive. The illustrations are original and admirable, but the absence of an index greatly lessens the value of the book. [Harper & Bros. $3.50.]

In India, by André Chevrillon, gives a Frenchman's impressions of India as gained in a two months' trip. He writes freely of the things which interest him—in many cases things which would not be noticed by the ordinary traveler. In Calcutta he is overwhelmed by the heat, which he thinks intensified by the whiteness of the universal raiment and of the houses, and he calls the city "a mélange of Asia and London." In the Himalayas he seems to be particularly impressed by the completeness with which the English have taken possession of the summer resorts. At Benares he writes many pages about the superstitions and rites of Brahmanism and his own musings concerning them. The Taj inspires him to a most enthusiastic description, and his characterization of Delhi, Agra and Jaipur are interesting. He says of Bombay, "Since the time of Alexander there has been no such epitome of the entire world, no city so cosmopolitan," and tells of the Salvation Army, clad in Oriental costume, holding a meeting on the street, each one being protected from the heat by an umbrella. Altogether, the book gives some novel and entertaining additions to our knowledge of a most interesting country. [Henry Holt & Co. $1.50.]

Pleasant Memories of Foreign Travel, by S. M. Burnham, illustrated. This is the account of a year's travel and residence in Europe, pleasantly written, but neither covering new ground nor reciting strange experiences. Many of the increasing host of travelers from America will, however, find the mirror of their own observations in it and be entertained. The pictures are well selected and reproduced. [Bradlee Whidden. $3 00.]

STORIES.

James Lane Allen is already well known as a writer of unusual power, and his Summer in Arcady displays some of the same charm that has made his Kentucky Cardinal, Aftermath, and the other sketches so popular. He says in the preface that this book is sent out as a protest against "the new fiction, full of unhealthy suggestions, which is at present invading our world of books." It is the story of a young man and maiden who, meeting frequently during the luxuriance of a Kentucky summer, awake to the knowledge of their passionate love for each other, and, since their parents oppose the match, they cross the river, which is the State line, and are married. Few writers have so sympathetically and truly revealed the inner life of healthy, happy young people just emerging from childhood, and scattered throughout the book are such wonderful bits of description as can come only from a true lover of nature. [New York: Macmillan & Co. $1.25.]

A Dike Shanty, by Maria Louise Pool, contains an unfailing fountain of delightful humor. Two spinsters come into possession of some acres of dike meadow on the shore of Massachusetts Bay, and in spite of the wonder and pity of the neighbors they take possession for the summer of the haymakers' shanty on their property, and proceed to get in their own crop of hay. The character drawing is sharp, keen-sighted and amusing, and in spite of the absence of an elaborated plot the book holds the attention of the reader from cover to cover. A more delightful bit of summer entertainment we have not recently discovered. [Stone & Kimball. $1.25.]

In the Village of Viger, by Duncan Campbell Scott, contains ten sketches of the simple, interesting characters of a Canadian village. The style is delightful, and there is considerable variety in the tales. The last one, called Paul Farlotte, is pathetic in its picture of self-sacrifice, wherein a lonely Frenchman gives up, year after year, his one desire, that of going back to France, just to help the needy family of a neighbor. [Copeland & Day. $1.00.]

The frequently-told story of a little girl who wears jewelry which she has been forbidden to touch, and loses it, appears once more under the title, Comfort Pease and Her Gold Ring. As it is told by Mary E. Wilkins and the scene is New England fifty years ago, it has originality and a good deal of clever character sketching and pathos. [Fleming H. Revell Co. 30 cents.]

Stories by English Authors is the title given to a set of volumes comprising some of the best short stories of recent years, with a few old favorites. They are grouped with regard to locality, the volumes already at hand being, Ireland, England, London and France. Other volumes are to be published later in the season. Both authors and stories have been well selected, and the printing and binding are attractive. [Charles Scribner's Sons. 75 cents.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Intent of Jesus, by David Nelson Beach, is a little book containing "the last two manuscript sermons which he preached at the Prospect Street Church," Cambridge, before his removal to Minneapolis. The sermons deal with the very heart of the Christian life, and illustrate those qualities which made him so dear to the church and community. There is a good portrait and a picture of the Prospect Street Church. [Boston: Cotton & Gould. 60 cents.]

American Orations, Studies in American Political History, edited with an introduction by the late Prof. Alexander Johnson of Princeton University, re-edited with notes by Prof. James A. Woodburn of Indiana University. Vol. I. In this new edition of a useful book Professor Woodburn has made changes chiefly by addition, a few substitutions only having been made to increase the value of the book for purposes of historical study. The new edition gives us an opportunity to commend the book again to readers and students. [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.25.]

A Text-book of the History of Architecture, by Prof. A. D. F. Hamlin of Columbia University. This book is one of a College History of Art Series, edited by Prof. John C. Van Dyke of Rutgers College. The matter is clearly and historically arranged and is well illustrated. Without attempting competition with the large and more comprehensive books on the topic, it gives an adequate and sufficient sketch of the whole subject, and will be of great use in study and preparation for travel and to those who wish to trace the development of man's art faculty under varying conditions. [Longmans Green & Co. $2.00.]

With the Fathers, by John Bach McMaster, contains several strong essays on political matters, most of which have already appeared in periodicals. Those on the Monroe Doctrine and The Third-Term Tradition are of especial interest, although all display the clear style, thorough knowledge and entertaining manner of imparting it for which the author is famous. [D. Appleton & Co. $1.50.]

The dainty White Mountain Glimpses which Frederick N. Kneeland of Northampton has issued contains twenty-seven fine half tones of mountain views from his own photographs, with a brief sketch of the mountains and some of his experiences in them. The book contains also papers on the geology and vegetation of the mountains and on the Appalachian Mountain Club, from its founding to the present time. It is a little different from anything heretofore published and is just the gift to send a friend who is a lover of the "White Hills." [Northampton, Mass.: F. N. Kneeland. $1.00 and $1.50.]

The Tucker Genealogy, by Ephraim Tucker. Genealogies are proverbially dull reading, but this book is certainly interesting, from the quaint and curious English researches at the beginning to the roll of Tuckers in the War of Independence. Among the eminent men noticed are Commodore Samuel Tucker, the Revolutionary hero, President Tucker of Dartmouth, and the venerable Joshua T. Tucker of the Boston Review, whose familiar face is perhaps the best of the many portraits. The claim to a high antiquity for the family, running back to Domesday Book and beyond, is well made out, though it must have been a German who suggested the connection with the Trojan Teucer. There are errors, as in all things human, but those we have detected are but trifling. [Worcester, Mass: Published by the author. $5.00.]

The Chap-Book, Vol. IV. (November to May 1895–96). This bound volume of a popular monthly gives a clear idea of the purposes and attainments of the editors and makes a tasteful volume containing much bright, fresh and novel matter in the way of stories and criticism. There is a neo-antique flavor about the whole make up that is very interesting. [Herbert S. Stone & Co. $1.50]

NOTES.

—"It is rumored," says the British Weekly, "that the poet laureate is to have a knighthood."

—A Bombay clergyman who addressed the Scotch Free Church Assembly said that it would be as fair and as wise to judge the French people by the ordinary erotic French novel as to judge the Anglo-Indian social structure by Rudyard Kipling's Plain Tales from the Hills.

—In our recent review of Holman's Sunday School Teachers' Bible we failed to make it clear that the excellent self-pronouncing feature is original with the publishers, and that the other editions to which we referred, and in which it has been used, are editions in smaller type issued by them.

—— The recent session of the Japanese Diet was marked by the adoption in a modified form of the civil code of legal procedure upon which the going into force of the new treaties depends. Aside from its political, this has a literary interest in its extension of the fundamental ideas of the Roman law to the usage of an Oriental nation.

—— In a letter to an English newspaper Mr. Ernest G. Atkinson of the London Public Record Office settles the long-debated question as to the side on which John Bunyan served during the Civil War. Mr. Atkinson has discovered amongst some Commonwealth papers the muster rolls of the Parliamentary garrison of Newport Pagnel, and Bunyan's name occurs several times in these lists.

—— The statement of Thomas Hardy, the novelist, to the effect that a writer has a perfect right to buy or borrow literary material with the consent of the original author, has awakened a storm of protests. Buying other men's work in art and literature is common enough, but the results have never been indorsed by fame. The trouble is that the highest quality of literary production is not for sale.

—— The New Age of London says:

A discovery has just been made of a relic which, should it prove genuine, will be a national object of veneration to the French. It is the armor given by Charles VII. to Joan of Arc. He ordered it to be made for her during the siege of Orleans. The armor has long hung in the hall of the Chateau de la Tour de Pinon in the Aisne, along with other suits of armor. They were bought by the father of the present owner, the Marquis de Courval. He had a taste for Gothic architecture, built the hall, and furnished it in 1830 like a fifteenth century armory. Nobody suspected that Joan of Arc's coat of mail was among the antiquities that he bought. It bears the arms that Charles VII. granted her, matches with the descriptions handed down to us, and would be a fit for a girl of five feet, three inches.

PRAYER MEETING.

BY REV. H. A. BRIDGMAN.

Topic, July 19–25. Books and Reading—How To Get Good Therefrom. Prov. 3: 13–23; 1 Tim. 4: 13.

Easy access to a great variety of literature is a distinctively modern privilege. They who lived in Bible times, and indeed as recently as in the days of our grandfathers, had no such opportunities as are within the reach of the poorest youth today. God will hold us responsible for such exceptional advantages. We ought to realize how much the things we read may have to do with making us robust and useful Christians. Show me the boy or girl who is reading wisely, systematically, thoughtfully, and I will show you an expanding Christian life. The trouble with us all is that our reading is too fragmentary, too desultory and unsystematic to be of much service. In no other department of our mental activity do we need a more clearly defined purpose.

Our reading should be, first of all, for instruction. This necessitates the prudent use of the daily, weekly and monthly periodicals. To live in this world we must understand what is going on, not only in the place where we live, but throughout the wide world. It is desirable, too, to have a special line of reading with reference to some particular subject—history, science or art. We sometimes tire, it is true, of hearing how much can be acquired if one devotes only fifteen minutes a day to some special theme, but we make a great mistake when we ignore such calculations, for it is solemnly true that some of the great books of the world can be mastered if we will only devote the time we give to trifles day by day to reading.

We ought to read, too, for recreation, especially those of us who are busy day by day with many practical affairs. Such a motive takes us into the field of stories and poetry. One needs to discriminate here, but a large side of one's life is neglected if we do not feed it with just this kind of reading. Poetry and novels, if partaken of in proper proportions, refresh the jaded spirit, quicken the imagination and give us nobler ideals.

But our highest motive in reading should be inspiration for life's work. "What can I get from this paper, this book, that will give me a keener sense of my duty, will make my daily tasks easier, will quicken my sympathy with all my suffering fellow-creatures, will bring out what is best in me and crush out that which would drag me downward"—this should be the great consideration in all our use of literature. "Never fear," said Phillips Brooks, "to bring the greatest comfort to the least trouble and the largest inspiration to the smallest duty." Books can help us widely in the daily toil and strife, and it is no excuse in these days of Chautauqua courses and of unnumbered books of advice, like that standard work of Noah Porter's, Books and Reading, that we do not know how to begin. If you are in doubt go straight to some wiser person, your minister, your Sunday school teacher, your friend, and ask him to give you some suggestions in your reading.

In this matter we cannot look to Christ for a specific example, for, though he doubtless read what was available to him, most of the literature which we naturally read has been created since he was on earth. We can, however, take the thought of what he would read and how he would read it if he were here today as a safe criterion. Who can doubt that he would read for instruction, refreshment and inspiration?

THE GREETING AT PLYMOUTH.

TO THE CONGREGATIONALIST PILGRIMS.

When the members of The Congregationalist Pilgrimage to England and Holland reached Plymouth they were met by a representative deputation of English ministers, whose spokesman, Rev. Samuel Vincent, read the following beautiful address, which we think all our readers will be glad to read entire:

Dear and Honored Brethren of the Congregational Churches of the United States: We, who represent the Free Churches of Plymouth and her sister towns, Devonport and Stonehouse, welcome you this morning from the sea to the shores from which the Mayflower sailed two and three-quarters of a century ago.

As Americans, who are wide-awake, when it is worth your while, it was your pleasure some hours ago to watch the English hills as they rose in the dawn out of the sea and the night to hail you as the sons of the Pilgrim Fathers, now returning to give your greetings to the coasts of the old Fatherland. As you looked landward, we are sure you gave a thought to those who long ago saw the same hills fading from their eyes, perhaps through a mist of tears. You are come from the land they sought and found, for liberty, religion and man.

The shores on both sides of the Atlantic are the same as then, and yet how changed they are! Then, under James I., England alone had less than 3,000,000 of inhabitants; now the people of our island kingdoms together number nearly 40,000,000, and our venerable and illustrious Queen Victoria, entering in ten days upon the sixtieth year of her happy reign, which four months more will make the longest in our "island story," rules over nearly 400,000,000 subjects, spread over 9,000,000 square miles of territory, embracing the largest and the most loyal and contented empire known to ancient or modern history.

You on the other side of the sea have grown from the handful of men and women who landed on Plymouth Rock to a nation of 70,000,000, in forty-four great States, welded into one, and covering, from Atlantic to Pacific, the most fruitful part of a continent whose future no prophet can foretell. Looking at both sides of the sea, we may ask, "What hath God wrought?" and say:

God's gifts put man's best dreams to shame.

We welcome you, dear brethren, as our "kinsmen according to the flesh." We are bound fast to one another by blood and speech—Shakespeare's speech, yours and ours. These ties alone forbid all rivalries between us but those of peace. War with one another should only be named to call it a crime. But you are also our kindred in Christ. We are one with you in faith. We hail you as Christian brethren. Then, too, we all alike belong to the Free Churches—free from the blight and bondage of sacerdotalism. We hate priestcraft for our fathers' sake and our own, for Christ's sake and the people's. We judge it by its fruit through Christendom and history. Take a sample near at hand. There on Drake's Island, our local Patmos, Abraham Cheare, a Baptist and Congregationalist, was imprisoned and died under Charles II. because he would not cease to preach the gospel which we preach today. Silence was the price of liberty; such as he and John Bunyan must not preach without priestly license. Priests ask only a monopoly of the gospel, and they will oblige you with it on easy terms; only you must take it on their terms and from their hands. Cheare and his fellows knew, as we know, that these claimants to authority have no title, that the New Testament knows nothing of a priestly caste, and that the priest and human liberty are in opposite camps. Priestcraft is synonymous with bondage, so the Pilgrim Fathers became exiles and Cheare died in his prison. As pastor of the George Street Church he had ministered to many who had said farewell to that little heroic band of emigrants, and watched the Mayflower out of sight from the Hoe, none dreaming how pregnant she was with empire and liberty.

Today, instead of sad farewell, we exchange pleasant greetings, which have an international interest.

Everywhere in this land hearty welcomes await you, but none more heartfelt than this. May God graciously guide you as his pilgrims. After a joyous and invigorating holiday take back with you, brethren, the love of English hearts, and pleasant memories of English homes and scenes. Long may your churches flourish, and your missions spread light and love and freedom through the world, and let us pray that the union of our two great nations may be the pledge of peace, liberty and true religion for all mankind.

THE UNRELIEVED SITUATION IN TURKEY.

FRESH NEWS FROM THE FRONT.

A letter just received from an observer in Aintab, in whom we have confidence, says: "I am only surprised to see so little of Russia's part, which is really the underlying cause of this deluge of blood and tears. It has been particularly unfortunate to have such a man as Mr. Terrell at the helm of affairs at such a crisis. His apathy, incredulity and incapacity are quite astonishing. Mr. Riddle, now acting during his absence, is, as compared with him, the very lightning of Olympus. He appears to be a truly capable man.

"I think the legation and the State Department are nothing short of a disgrace to our nation. Why should not the United States Government feel bound to protect American interests and citizens abroad to the full extent of treaty rights, not to speak of her larger and more sacred duties to suffering humanity? Is the Monroe Doctrine or any other doctrine so precious that we will sacrifice for it the dignity of our nation and all humanitarian and Christian motives and instincts that bind a Christian and civilized nation to an afflicted and martyred people?

"What, then, is the meaning of the parable of the Good Samaritan or of the life of the Son of Man? Do they teach us to live an isolated and selfish life? Do they tell us that we should leave a bleeding man alone with his agony, and yet go on playing the polite gentleman to his defiant murderer? I confess I fail to see just where conscience and the gospel come in in the foreign policy of the Administration at Washington. Of course, our politicians of the Capitol will view any such reasoning with supreme contempt. I cannot hope to reach the serene hights where those lofty gentlemen have their abode, but to us ordinary immortals it seems quite clear that a Christian republic ought to be a power working for righteousness all over the world, and ought to give no uncertain sound at such an outburst of savagery and barbarism, so that the world shall know just where she stands in matters of common rights and morality."

The same gentleman, writing under date of June 4, says that "the horizon is again darkened and mutterings of storm are ominous and most disquieting." The exact nature and extent of the plot involved is not yet fully known. It, however, seems most probable that "the Axe party" among the Moslems, having been unusually excited by some successes which the Moderate party have recently gained over them and also by the release of so many of the Christian prisoners at Aleppo, for whose conviction they have been so long laboring and "preparing" witnesses, had planned a demonstration in order to terrify and break the Christians and also to embarrass and perhaps to force the hand of the Moderate party. Just to what extent they proposed to carry the affair is not well known, but many things combine to indicate that our city has had a narrow escape from some serious disturbance. Mr. Sanders has returned and reports security and confidence better established in Oorfa and Adiaman than in Aintab. In Behesni, however, where there has been no massacre, the situation is extremely critical, owing to the demand of neighboring Kurds for revenge for some of their number who were killed in the unsuccessful attempt which they made on the city a few months ago. The reports from Severek are also bad.

A COUNTRY HOME FOR NEGLECTED CHILDREN.

Any wise effort to provide wholesome surroundings and happy homes for the multitude of neglected children that throng our great cities deserves recognition and support. Obviously a country community possesses many advantages if an institution designed to care for this class is to be established, and the projectors of the Kurn Hattin Homes at Westminster, Vt., seem to have been duly appreciative of the special fitness of that place. On the western bank of the Connecticut, about eighteen miles north of Brattleboro, in a town beautiful for situation, it is in easy railroad connection with Boston and other large cities, while the cost of maintaining such an enterprise must be much less than if it were located in an urban or suburban district.

These homes were opened in July, 1894. Hon. W. J. Van Patten, the president of the board of trustees, is one of the leading Congregationalists of Vermont, a man of large business interests and of high standing as a citizen and Christian worker. Rev. C. A. Dickinson, D. D, of Boston is one of the two vice-presidents, and Rev. G. H. De Bevoise, formerly of Keene, N. H., is the other, serving also as financial agent. The care of the buildings is in the efficient hands of Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin F. Moore. Pres. W. J. Tucker, D. D., of Dartmouth College heads the board of trustees. At present about a score and a half of children, ranging in age from six to fifteen years and representing every New England State except Maine, are enjoying the benefits of the homes. A strict regimen, the end of which is to cultivate habits of neatness, punctuality and teachableness, does not interfere with a good degree of freedom and merriment, as any one who has visited the homes will testify. School work and labor on the farm are conjoined in a happy proportion. A bright little monthly is published by the institution, and those who would know more about its needs and opportunities are advised to secure it from Mr. Moore at Westminster or from Rev. C. A. Dickinson.

IN MEMORIAM.

In the death of Dr. Edward K. Baxter at his residence, 874 Beacon Street, Boston, on the 22d of May last, many religious, benevolent and humane societies and objects lose a stanch friend and benefactor.

He was the youngest son of Harry and Deborah Steele Baxter and was born in Barton, Vt., in 1840. After the death of his father he went to live with an uncle at Sharon, Vt., where his summer home was at the time of his death. After completing his studies at Kimball Union Academy, Meriden, N. H., on account of rather frail health, he deemed it best to give up his cherished plan of a collegiate course, this lack being supplemented by extensive reading and study.

Dr. Baxter, after studying with Drs. Dixi and A. B. Crosby, the famous physicians, and after attending three courses at the Dartmouth Medical College and one at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York city, graduated at the Dartmouth Medical College in 1864, taking a high rank in his class, his examinations and thesis being wonderfully fine. He was a physician at the Insane Retreat, Hartford, Ct., and at Sanford Hall, Flushing, L. I He was very enthusiastic in his chosen profession, with high aspirations, but owing to his health he was obliged to give up very active practice. He was thus enabled to devote much time to study, collecting a fine library, largely composed of medical works, also taking the best journals and periodicals, and was an occasional contributor to them, thus keeping abreast of the times, it being truly said of him that he was one of the best read doctors in his vicinity. He was a member of the Vermont Medical Society and of the American Medical Association.

He was very fond of the natural sciences, his fine microscope being a source of much interest to him, invaluable in his profession and in examining God's minutest creations, his friends often being entertained by viewing his fine specimens, some prepared by himself. Botany, ornithology and mineralogy were favorite studies. Every bird in his region was known by its plumage or song, and every plant, tree and flower was familiar. Dr. Baxter was a Bible student, all his researches pointed to God as a wonderful and wise Creator, enhancing his love and reverence for him. He felt that he became a Christian when a boy, but when a student at K. U. A. this interest was revived and strengthened, causing him to come out boldly for his Lord. He soon united with the Congregational church in Sharon, of which he was ever after a most consistent, active and generous member, serving it as clerk and treasurer for many years, and in numerous ways ever ready to work for its interests. He retained a warm love for Kimball Union Academy, becoming one of its most generous benefactors. He possessed a cultivated taste for music, singing in the church choir for many years, keenly appreciating the beautiful in poetry and art.

In the last ten years of his life large business interests and trusts were thrust into his hands, which were entered into with the same conscientiousness and much of the enthusiasm which had characterized his other pursuits. In this increased care and anxiety he did not forget his responsibility to God. As the years advanced all good causes were increasingly dear to him, receiving larger gifts from him. He was a life member of the Vermont Domestic Missionary Society, the Vermont Bible Society, the Vermont Humane Society, honorary member of the A. B. C. F. M, remembering them liberally.

He was a lover of animals, deeply feeling their wrongs, consequently a warm friend of the Mass. S. P. C. A., and one of its vice-presidents. Dr. Baxter was actively interested in the business, educational, political and religious interests of his town, giving liberally to advance its welfare. He regretted that he was obliged to defer some cherished plans of benevolence by reason of the depression in the times. He was ever ready to aid the poor and unfortunate, and was one of the kindest, most thoughtful and care-taking of men in his family. For years he ministered to the comfort of aged ones in his home, remaining with them and giving up his own wishes and plans for their sakes.

He was a sufferer much of his life, but so patiently borne, many times not detected by those nearest him. During his last illness this trait was very marked, his physician and nurse remarking that he was the most patient man they ever saw. His pure, noble and unselfish nature shone brightly in those last months. Life was very sweet to him, with his resources for enjoyment, his two pleasant homes, with means to gratify his cultivated tastes. Yet, when he detected with the eye of a physician that his disease would prove fatal, there was not a murmur. He said he would like to live that he might do more good, and for his wife, to whom he well knew his death would bring such crushing sorrow. Until the last few hours, as long as he could speak, he sent messages and planned gifts to absent friends, to some expressing the wish that they might be Christians and meet him in heaven. When living at his home in Boston Dr. Baxter attended the Mt. Vernon Church, enjoying the ministrations of his pastor, Dr. S. E. Herrick, whose prayers solaced his last days on earth.

Dr. Baxter married Miss Sarah S., daughter of Col. Gardner and Susan Steele Burbank. He was buried among the green hills of his native State, in Sharon, Vt.

The Imperial Supreme Court of Germany has rejected the appeal of Baron von Hammerstein, found guilty of forgery, and sentenced him to three years at hard labor. He used his place as editor-in-chief of the Kreuz Zeitung to line his pockets with gold, and he has met a just fate.

A call has gone forth for the selection of delegates from bodies of Irishmen in this country, indorsing and supporting the Irish Home Rule movement, to represent American pro-Irish sentiment at a race convention to be held in Dublin, Sept. 1.

Rev. Alexander McKenzie, D. D., President; George Gould, Treasurer.

PASSING COMMENT.

The great success, unparalleled in its locality, of the plan of a Michigan pastor for stirring his workers into activity is a more forcible indorsement of the idea than words can be.

It seems that a Massachusetts church feels a direct responsibility for the observance of the Sabbath by its summer supplies.

That Connecticut church which finds half of the registered members of its congregation unwilling to contribute to its support will have the sympathy of many another church which has met a like exigency. With such conditions the removal of prominent givers is doubly hard.

For diversity of church relations, changes and growth the Minnesota news this week is rather exceptional, but no note of discouragement is heard from there.

If fresh air work was aided generally by such generosity on the part of public conveyance companies as in Worcester, Mass., there would be no reason why every place should not successfully support an outing mission.

Twilight services, especially adapted to warm evenings and including attractive features of a musical and devotional character, are proving a success in some places.

Why should not each church appoint a board of practical housekeepers to look after its domestic economy? If this were done we believe that the poor ventilation and other unhygienic conditions now tolerated in many imposing structures would speedily disappear.

We have received a copy of a notice which is used by one church for notifying each member of the approaching preparatory lecture and communion. It is doubtless not because the idea would be lacking in benefit in all our churches that they do not use it.

SUMMER CONDITIONS IN SAN FRANCISCO.

Vacation.

Trade winds are blowing, schools are closing, and those whom the hard times will permit are hastening to mountain, glen and seaside, and churches are feeling the exodus. Several pastors are seeking recuperation at favored haunts within the State, while some already have gone, or will soon go, to the far away East. Among the latter is Rev. William Rader of the Third Church, who is delegated to the Christian Endeavor convention in Washington to represent the young people, with whom he is exceedingly popular. He may also be joined by Plymouth's beloved pastor, Dr. W. D. Williams. They have been preceded by Superintendent Wirt of the S. S. Society, who spends his summer with the "new world pilgrims at old world shrines."

Politics.

McKinley and protection strike responsive chords. The financial plank, however, meets with some disfavor. Strange as it may seem to Eastern readers, not only politicians and "silver barons," but good men part ways at this point. Sincere, seeking the best interests of the country, the latter differ in judgment. But from the ratification meetings already held and the cordial support given by papers heretofore espousing silver the party may well be encouraged. But at the same time there will be the battle for woman suffrage; the "weaker" sex is demanding a right. For weeks the agitation has been on. Influential papers, State conventions and leading bodies of men have given their indorsement. Noted women are in the field. Susan B. Anthony is here and Rev. Anna H. Shaw, both traversing the State with able local advocates and speaking in the most important centers. Enthusiasm attends them and yet there is more than indifference to overcome. Not only some men but women also are opposed. An anti-suffrage league is pressing to the front. 'Tis woman against woman. Men are the jury. The judge—who?

Anniversaries.

Anniversaries have been in order of late. Alameda, rejoicing in seventeen years of successful life, finds herself well equipped in every way, with a membership of nearly 300, all the organizations in good working order, and united in the pastor, Rev. W. W. Scudder, Jr., with an encouraging outlook for a new edifice on the fine corner lot. Sonoma, somewhat older, gave a day to the celebration of its quarter-centennial. Five men have filled the pastorate, one spending seven years, another three, the third nine, another two. The present pastor is just completing four years. Strangely enough, though quite widely separated, all are in California. The day was bright and the gathering delightful. Rev. C. E. Chase, the pastor, than whom the church has never had a better, faces the future hopefully, with a faithful band of workers in one of the most charming valleys of the Golden State. Soon following this was the glad occasion at Benicia—thirty years a church. Among its former pastors were the venerable Dr. Willey of San Francisco and Rev. J. B. Thrall of Albany, N. Y. Rev. Samuel Weyler recently came to this pulpit from Wyoming. By birth he is a Russian Jew, by choice a devoted minister of the gospel.

First Church.

Much to the sorrow of us all the doors of First Church are still closed. Effort was made to dispose of the property, but the opposition prevented the court from granting th decree. The late pastor, Dr. C. O. Brown, who many understood was about to leave the city, listened to the overtures of devoted admirers, and is now preaching in a hired hall. Meanwhile, no successor is mentioned, and during vacation the matter necessarily lies in abeyance. But with the return of the families in the late summer or early fall effort will, doubtless, be put forth to resume worship and gather the scattered forces.

Missions.

To a large number at the Monday Club, Superintendent Harrison, on his return from New Haven, reported the seventieth meeting of the H. M. S., much to the interest and delight of all. Problems affecting the work suggested there are under consideration here. Some feel that as much would be accomplished if the home boards could be united under a central management, and not a little saved in the expense of administration, while others, notably the venerable Dr. Holbrook, are firmly of the opinion that under the present system far more is given than otherwise would be for the great work pressing on all sides, and if, indeed, the cost be somewhat larger, it is fully justified by the results. Others feel that, could some way be devised by which, as a denomination, we could have a common church year, affairs would be greatly simplified. But whatever the opinions, the devotion is none the less great. Superintendent Wirt and Missionary Cooke are planting Sunday schools, about one a week, and from some of these churches are growing. As resources will allow Superintendent Harrison is manning the latter with the best material at his command, and so far as receipts will warrant the Building Society is cheerfully coming to the assistance of any needy enterprises.

OCCIDENT.

TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY YEARS A CHURCH.

The celebration of the 250th anniversary of the church in Old Saybrook, Ct., to which reference was made in The Congregationalist of last week, took place July 1. The weather left nothing to be desired, the recently renovated auditorium proved comfortable as well as beautiful, and the attendance from adjoining towns as well as from a distance was large. The exercises of the morning opened with devotional exercises conducted by Rev. F. R. Shipman of Andover and Dr. Lewellyn Pratt of Norwich, both descendants of founders of the church. The present pastor and president of the day, Rev. E. E. Bacon, then gave a brief welcome, following which came a historical address by the venerable Dr. A. S. Chesebrough, to whose zeal, forethought and historic sense the celebration is in large measure due. Greetings were brought from the First Church, Hartford, by Rev. Dr. Lamson, and a letter was read from Rev. W D. Sexton, a former pastor.

The program of the afternoon looked portentously long, but it proved so varied and was carried out with so much spirit as to offer little excuse for weariness. The first address on The Founders, 1646, was made by Rev. E. M. Chapman of Worcester, himself descended from four of the worthies for whom he spoke. The four daughters of the church—the First Church of Norwich, 1660; the First Church of Old Lyme, 1693; the church in Centerbrook, 1725; the First Church of Westbrook, 1726—sent their greetings through Rev. C. A. Northrop, Rev. Arthur Shirley, Deacon E. A. Griswold and Rev. G. F. Bailey, respectively, while James R. Sheffield, Esq., of New York spoke of the ministries of Rev. William Hart and Rev. F. W. Hotchkiss, both direct ancestors of his own, whose successive pastorates covered the 108 years from 1736 to 1844.

The interest of the celebration was further enhanced by the presence of another descendant of an early member of the church, in the person of the governor of Ohio, Hon. Asa S. Bushnell, who spoke on Connecticut Emigra tion to Ohio and Its Results. President Dwight also participated in the exercises, his address dealing with the beginnings of Yale University in the Collegiate School, whose sixteen earliest Commencements were held in Saybrook. The services concluded with prayer by Rev. W. H. Moore, a son of the Westbrook church, and the singing of a hymn written for the occasion by Mrs. F. T. Bradley.

AFTER THE DROUGHT.

For four or five years past Eastern papers, in referring to Nebraska, have had little to say but "crop failure and drought" as pleas for help in the time of distress. In view of this dismal past it is not amiss to mention the fact that today Nebraska presents the appearance of a beautiful garden. The rains have been frequent and abundant, exceeding the normal thus far in 1896 by nearly seven inches. From the beginning of spring products of the soil appeared in the markets and have so continued. The season began early and everything is two weeks or more in advance of the usual time. Just now farmers are harvesting wheat and barley and making hay. The pastures were never so bountiful. A great oat crop is rapidly ripening under the summer sun. The hot nights and still hotter days have caused a phenomenal growth of the vast acreage of corn. No fairer or more promising land can be found than Nebraska at the present.

This situation has inspired new hope and revived drooping spirits. Nebraska has been a great agricultural State in the past and certainly will be in the future. It is a mistake to suppose it only a place fit for Indians and wolves and to be avoided by enlightened people. The land is fair and peopled by a sturdy and patient race. Through years of trial and hardship men and women have held on with faith and in a spirit of independence. The necessity for outside assistance was less than advertised. The result was a tendency to pauperize. Nebraska will rally. Her people have learned valuable lessons of economy and thrift. Patience will be rewarded and cheap farming lands will soon attract home seekers once more.

But it has been among Congregational churches especially that Christian courage has been manifest. Contributions diminished sadly. The church income, small at best, almost disappeared and it would not have been surprising had many of the churches suspended entirely. In several cases the pastor could not be retained, but the services continued. Expenses were reduced. Brethren who could not give money gave service and the church was open at the usual time and the Sunday school was maintained. In other places the minister stood his ground and accepted what the people could give, biding better times. In all the churches, whether in city or country, the attempt has been made to live within the income and scarcely a church out of the nearly 200 has suspended entirely. Out of these trials and efforts must come better Christian lives and a better hope for this life and the one beyond. Count Nebraska still among the living and faithful.

CONFERENCES AND ASSOCIATIONS.

ME.—The fifty-seventh annual meeting of Franklin Conference was held at Wilton and proved of great interest. The sermon was by Rev. J. C. Young. Topics were: What Does Our Conference Stand For and How Can It Be Made More Useful? The Country Church, Reform in Town and County, Our Absent Members, The Connection of the Church and the School. Resolutions advocating independence in politics and the measures to insure the best citizenship were passed. A woman's meeting was helpful and excellent.

N. Y.—The annual meeting of the Essex Association was held in Ticonderoga, June 25, 26, Rev. George DeMott, pastor. The meeting was well attended. The subjects were: Denominational Loyalty, Greater Fellowship among the Churches. As a result of these discussions it was decided to hold an association ministers' meeting once in two months at a central point. The sermon on Power by the Holy Spirit was by Rev. P. N. Moore. The ladies' missionary meeting was helpful. Rev. Lemuel Jones of the H. M. S. occupied the last evening, besides making addresses at several points in the meeting. The A. M. A. was also presented by a speaker from the field.

WN.—The fifth annual meeting of Tacoma Association was held at Toledo, June 23-25. The themes were: Pastoral Visitation, The Church and Hard Times, One Need of Home Missionary Fields, What Reason for Expecting a Worldwide Revival? Is the Church Doing Her Best in Temperance Work? Why Do So Many Business and Professional Men Neglect the Church and Christianity? The Unchanging Gospel. During a recess of the association a council was held which ordained Mr. William A. Arnold to the ministry.

NEW ENGLAND.

Boston.

Highland will be open all summer. Sunday evening a prayer meeting will replace the usual preaching service. Other services continue as usual. The pastor, Rev. W. R. Campbell, will spend his vacation at Mt. Desert, Me., and Brewster, Mass. The pulpit supplies during August, beginning the second Sunday, will be: Rev. H. K. Job, North Middleboro; Rev. Nicholas Vander Pyl, Holliston; Rev. G. Y. Washburn, Waterville, Me.; Rev. S. L. Loomis, Newark, N. J.

Norwegian. Regular services continue as usual, the Sunday school at 3 P. M. and preaching service at 4 P. M. The pastor, Rev. Morten Olsen, preaches all summer. On Tuesday evenings prayer meetings will be held at the Emigrant Home, East Boston, and on Thursday evenings at Shawmut Church.

Massachusetts.

SOMERVILLE.—Franklin Street. The pulpit supplies for July and August are: July 12, Rev. W. G. Poor, Keene, N. H.; July 19, Rev. G. W. Judson, Orange, Mass.; July 26, Dr. F. W. Baldwin, East Orange, N. J.; Aug. 2, Rev. T. W. Harris, Lebanon Springs, N. Y. The services of the last four Sunday mornings of August will be held with the East Somerville Baptist church, and the preachers will be: Aug. 9 and 16, Rev. R. D. Grant, D. D., recently of Portland, Ore.; Aug. 23, Rev. E. S. Parsons, Colorado Springs, Col.; Aug. 30, Rev. C H. Cutler, Bangor, Me. During these months Sunday evening services conducted by the Young People's Society will be held in the vestry.

EVERETT.—First. The church will be kept open, with regular services during the summer. The pastor, Rev. A. B. Patten, will spend August as his vacation on the Maine coast.

LOWELL.—The Armenians are much pleased with the appointment of Rev. H. K. Santikian as their pastor. He began work under the auspices of the Massachusetts H. M. S. June 28. He is a graduate of the college at Harpoot and of Andover Seminary, and was for five years a native pastor among his own people, but was driven out by the Turkish massacre last year. He returned to this country and after many hardships his wife and three children have now joined him.——French. The church is rejoicing in the result of the Canadian elections, being confident that the refusal of the Catholic voters to obey their ecclesiastical authorities is the beginning of an independent spirit for which Protestants have long prayed.——Highland in arranging for its pulpit supplies during the pastor's vacation stipulates that the preachers must come to the city on Saturday instead of traveling on Sunday.

WORCESTER.—Pilgrim gave a reception, July 2, to its young people who graduated this year from the various schools and institutions. The 22 additions at the July communion make a total of 62 since Dr. Lewis began his pastorate Jan. 1.——Second Swedish. The same council that dismissed Rev. J. R. Armstrong also ordained and installed his successor, Rev. John Udd. This church was organized a little over a year ago with 54 members. During Mr. Armstrong's pastorate it has been self-supporting, more than doubled its membership and built up a Sunday school of over 200.——Dr. Mix, superintendent of the City Missionary Society, has just completed, through his visitors, a very careful religious census of the city, showing the nationality and religious status of every family. The Protestant population is rapidly moving to the west side and their places are taken by the foreign population. There are almost exclusive colonies of Armenians, Jews, Italians, Syrians, French and Swedes and the majority of the Irish, all east of Main Street. In this entire east side district there is not a strong Protestant church except the First Swedish and First Baptist on Salem Square, and the continuance of some of the existing small churches is a serious problem It is also significant that every licensed wholesale and retail liquor saloon, excepting one hotel, is in this district. All dens of vice of every sort are located here, managed and patronized principally by these classes. The problem of city evangelization becomes thus defined; and municipal safety, as well as Christian obligation, demands aggressive work. The city fresh air work for children and mothers was committed to the society last year and will be carried on the same way this year. The electric car lines and steamboats at the lake grant free rides for this work.

PALMER.—Second. Out-district meetings are sustained by this church every Sunday afternoon. During the months of July and August the Tuesday evening service is discontinued. The pastor recently received a gift from the men of his congregation of a check for $100 for a bicycle. He will take his vacation commencing July 12, and continuing into August: The Ladies' Society and Y. P. S. C. E. have purchased new chairs for use in the prayer meetings.

DALTON.—This church, through the generosity of Mrs. Mary E. Crane, has been made a life member of the General Theological Library of Boston, which gives the pastor the right to draw books from this collection. At the annual parish meeting the prudential committee were instructed to place electric lights in the meeting house and chapel if proper terms could be made. The pastor is Rev. G. W. Andrews.

Maine.

FRYEBURG.—Mr. Ernest Abbott, son of Dr. Lyman Abbott, is supplying here for a month. He is a graduate of Andover.

SEBAGO.—The people part with Rev. G. P. Merrett with regret. He has done good work here. Rev. W. H. Hume succeeds him this year.

BETHEL.—The pastor, Rev. Israel Jordan, and family are absent on a two months' vacation, during which the pulpit will be supplied.

New Hampshire.

PIERMONT.—The coming of the new pastor, Rev. C. H. Cooledge, by his enthusiasm and abundant labors, has awakened new interest and infused new vigor into the varied services of the church. New life has been especially manifest in the prayer meetings, and with the union and hearty co-operation of the church an era of marked promise and prosperity is looked for. Active measures have been put in operation to increase the attendance and infuse with new zeal the Sunday school, including reorganization, the introduction of a new singing book and the use of the blackboard. Several persons were received to the church at the communion service, July 5.

NASHUA.—Pilgrim. The attendance on the Sunday evening services, through the cordial invitations, polite attentions and warm welcomes of the Young Men's Sunday Evening Club, has been largely increased. Short, pointed, suggestive sermons by the pastor and special music, with the assistance of a solo cornetist, have made the services impressive and profitable. The Sunday school includes a class of Armenians. A branch school has been organized for the summer in an out-district schoolhouse.

WINCHESTER.—The pastor, Rev. H. A. Hanaford, has nearly completed his eighth year of service. During this period the church edifice has been repaired and renovated at a cost of $3,300, and memorial windows and a pipe organ have been put in, costing $1,500. Thirty-eight persons have united with the church. The morning service has been improved by the recent addition of introductory sentences, the Gloria, Apostles' Creed and two brief collects, followed by the Lord's Prayer.

LEE.—Through the generosity of friends in Dover the parsonage, which for the past three years has remained unoccupied because of its unsuitable condition, has been thoroughly repaired, renovated and fitted for occupancy. The new pastor, Rev. B. A. Willmott, late of Bangor Seminary, was ordained to his work July 1.

KEENE —Second. A pleasant surprise was given the pastor, Rev. Archibald McCord, and his estimable wife, by his people at the church parlors on the evening of their 20th wedding anniversary. The program included the reading of poems, singing of songs and delightful social festivities.

Vermont.

BURKE.—The union meeting house was rededicated June 28, over 600 persons being present. The sermon was preached by Rev. M. C. Henderson and the prayer was offered by Rev. Henry Fairbanks. Extracts were read from an interesting historical sketch by Mrs. Walter. Rev. C. H. Merrill conducted the exercises.

MORRISVILLE.—The church worships for a time in the town hall, the old building being rendered unfit for occupancy by removal. The new house will be erected within four months. Eight or nine memorial windows are already provided for.

Connecticut.

GREENWICH.—First. A neat pamphlet of about 30 pages has been published by the church as a review of the 250th anniversary and of the services at the laying of the corner stone of the new edifice last fall. Numerous fine illustrations show a likeness of the present pastor, Rev. D. W. C. Eggleston, of the old building, of the new church and other subjects connected with the church. The new edifice was dedicated June 25. The ground was broken for the building in April, 1895, and the cost of the structure was over $21,000. This is the fifth edifice erected by this church since 1670. The one preceding this was destroyed by fire last year. The new house is a monument to the earnest efforts of those who have carried through the enterprise. It is built of gray granite, is of Tudor-Gothic architecture and cruciform in shape. The audience-room seats 200 persons and can be enlarged by opening the Sunday school room. The choir gallery is in the rear of the pulpit. There are three memorial windows, beautiful in design and rich in coloring. In the basement is a banquet-room and social hall with the usual conveniences. The necessary funds to meet the expense of the work were almost made up at the dedication service, so that the building was practically dedicated free of debt. Dr. A. J. F. Behrends preached a strong sermon and Dr. D. M. Seward offered the prayer.

NEW HAVEN.—Howard Avenue. A memorial window representing the Good Shepherd has been placed in the meeting house in memory of the late Deacon William C. Scrobie. Twenty Bibles were recently given to children who had passed their eighth birthday during the year as a sign that they are now a part of the congregation. No more evening services will be held until fall.——Of the 600 student delegates at the conference of Christian Workers at Northfield, Yale sent 70.——Redeemer. Rev. H. E. Peabody, who was installed as assistant pastor of this church recently, will take charge of Welcome Hall Mission, which it is proposed to make a branch of the church.

MIDDLETOWN.—South. Rev. F. W. Greene spoke on the finances of the church a week ago Sunday morning. The church has run behind each year lately and the deficiency has been made up by subscription. Fifty per cent. of the names on the church register are never heard from in the matter of contributions. Pledge cards have been sent out to all the members asking that they contribute towards this deficiency. One cause of the running behind is the church music, the expense of which was formerly always borne by the late Hon. John D. Camp.

NORWICH.—The semi-annual conference of Swedish Congregationalists of the Eastern States was held here of late for four days. The principal address was by Rev. E. G. Hjerpe of New Britain, president of the conference. Rev. S. V. S. Fisher of Minneapolis, superintendent of Scandinavian work in the West, also described his work. The meeting was one of the most successful ever held.

NEW LONDON.—The first service in the new union chapel at Eastern Point was held last week, Dr. E. W. Gilman of New York officiating. The chapel has a seating capacity of 200 and all seats are free. Clergymen of different denominations from various places will conduct services this summer.

NEW BRITAIN.—First and South will unite in their Sunday evening services during July, the services on the first and third Sunday evenings being held with the South Church. During August union meetings of all services will be held as usual with out-of-town preachers.

HIGGANUM.—The unveiling of a picture of Rev. George S. Pelton, formerly pastor of this church, took place in the chapel recently with appropriate exercises. Only two ex-pastors are now living. The first pastor was Rev. David D. Field, D. D.

WILLIMANTIC.—First. The audience-room will be redecorated during the next two months by provision made by the women's society. About $1,000 will be expended.

Over $65 was raised in Bristol at the union mass meeting a week ago Sunday evening for the Armenian cause.——The Ladies' Aid Society of East Canaan at their recent fair and festival cleared over $50.

MIDDLE STATES.

New York.

BINGHAMTON.—First. Stainer's sacred cantata, The Daughter of Jairus, was rendered by the quartet on a recent Sunday evening before an audience that crowded the house. The pastor, Rev. W. B. Thorp, enforced the lesson of the Scripture narrative in a short address. The vacation supplies include Professor Coddington of Syracuse, Dr. Edward Taylor of Binghamton and Dr. Washington Gladden. The lecture-room will be recarpeted and decorated during the pastor's vacation.

SMYRNA.—This church has been much afflicted of late by the financial disasters which have fallen upon the place, and especially in the breaking down physically and mentally of Herbert M. Dixon, its leading member. Mr. Dixon died June 26. He was not only prominent locally, but also in the State, being a member of the executive committee of the C. H. M. S. and of the New York H. M. S.

SYRACUSE.—Dr. Packard and family are taking their vacation at Thousand Islands. Rev. H. A. Manchester will be with his parents in Niagara County, near Gasport. Rev. H. N. Kinney will preach here and there, supplying prominent churches in New England and in this State. Rev. F. L. Luce will be at a point not far from Syracuse.

NORWICH.—First. The pastor, Rev. W. H. Scudder, having accepted a call to Tacoma, Wn., the church has voted to accept his resignation, at the same time passing resolutions of high appreciation for his labors here and of his close relations with all the organizations of the church.

SCHROON LAKE.—Rev. Lemuel Jones has been spending two or three weeks on this field, where his labors were fruitful early in the season. Rev. Henry Lewis of Dr. Virgin's church, New York, and of the last class of Union Seminary, is just beginning work with this church.

SALAMANCA.—On Children's Sunday 14 children and one adult were baptized by the pastor of this church, Rev. M. L Dalton. This was the largest number ever baptized at one time in the history of the church.

New Jersey.

WOODBRIDGE.—"Twilight services" have been held during June with good results, and will probably be continued. The hour of Sunday evening worship was put at seven, and no lamps were used, the effort being, by appeal through a pastoral letter beforehand and by other means, to make it eminently an hour of worship. Music and prayer and address were all keyed to the idea of evening devotions. The church is at work on plans for a new Sunday school room, which, it is hoped, may be erected before winter. A bicycle picnic recently was declared by all a success, especially as to sociability.

PLAINFIELD.—At a recent service an accounting was made of the five-cent pieces given out on the Sunday school "rally day" last September for investment for missionary purposes. The $5.25 intrusted to the young stewards came back multiplied about 12 fold—over $60. The school is supporting a pupil in Japan and another in Turkey and this coming year will also support a Sunday school in the West, besides giving for other benevolent purposes. The pastor, Rev. C. L. Goodrich, will be away during August.

NEWARK.—Belleville Avenue. The pastor, Rev. S. L Loomis, will spend his vacation at Plymouth, Mass., the pulpit being supplied during his absence by two other members of the church, Rev. W. H. Ward and Rev. C. C. Collins. During the pastor's absence renovation and repairs will be effected.

PARK RIDGE.—The church will maintain all its services during the summer. The pastor also follows up his people who are to summer elsewhere by interviewing or writing to the pastors of the churches in the places where they are to be. This church was never more prosperous than now.

ORANGE.—Valley. The benevolences of this church, Rev. C. A. Savage, pastor, were $3,056 last year—not, as we were misinformed last week, $1,056. Three shares were taken in the General Howard Roll of Honor and about $200 given for the suffering Armenians.

EAST ORANGE.—Dr. C. H. Everest, pastor of the First Church, has just left for Europe, and Dr. F. W. Baldwin of Trinity spends his vacation at Marlboro, N. H., and in other New England places.

BOUND BROOK.—The interest under the new pastor, Rev. J. O. Jones, continues. Seven new members have just been received. A men's Bible class has just been organized.

THE SOUTH.

District of Columbia.

WASHINGTON.—The Congregational churches of the city combine in mailing to each of their members every Friday afternoon a copy of a small sheet called The Washington Congregationalist. The first page is devoted to notices of the church and week day services. It is interesting to glance over the working orders of the several churches as they thus appear arranged in parallel columns. The other pages are devoted to advertisements and reading matter.——First. The preparatory lecture came the week preceding the great C. E. Convention. Dr. Newman spoke of the convention as the greatest opportunity that the bulk of this church would have to come in contact with what he called the most characteristic movement of the age. He urged his people not to lose sight of the object of the great gathering in the preparations for its entertainment. Over the large doors in the vestibule is the word Massachusetts, as an indication that this place is headquarters for that State.

Georgia.

WAY CROSS.—Whitehall. This church, Rev. J. S. King, pastor, held special services June 15–25, which were greatly blessed. It is thought that at least 30 persons were converted, and that about the same number of believers entered on a higher religious life.

THE INTERIOR.

Indiana.

INDIANAPOLIS.—Brightwood continues to have large congregations, the edifice being too small to accommodate those who desire to attend in the evening. An additional lot has been purchased and enlargement is being seriously considered. Rev. C. E. Grove is pastor.——Plymouth. The McCulloch Club closed its evening services for the season, June 28, with an unusually elaborate program. The Vested Boys' Choir of St. Paul's filled the singers' seats, and the congregation packed the house. Special numbers were also rendered by soloists. Extracts of Lowell's address on Democracy were read, and the pastor, Rev. F. E. Dewhurst, discoursed eloquently on Civic Faith. An elegant souvenir of Oscar C. McCulloch's birthday anniversary was distributed in the congregation.——Rev. A. F. Ayres of Ohio is visiting the South Side with a view to settlement.

FORT WAYNE.—Plymouth is gaining in its record for benevolences as it gets settled in its new home. Fifty dollars were recently given the South Church toward its repairs, $50 went to Ridgeville College and $35 to the A. B. C. F. M. Rev. J. S. Ainslie is inculcating giving to all the societies and the increasing membership is united in the church missionary society, a distinct feature of the work.——South. A reception was given by the church, July 2, to Rev. E. E. Frame, the occasion being the first anniversary of his pastorate. The year has been one of growing unity and effective service along many lines. About $450 have been expended in repairs, and the congregation and Sunday school have gradually become larger and the attendance more uniform.

ELWOOD.—Welsh reports progress. Work was commenced a year ago. The second year opens with good prospects. A neat building, seating 300 people and costing, with lot, $1,500, has been erected, furnished and, with $300 aid from the C. C. B. S., paid for. There are 35 members and a Sunday school of 120. Congregations are excellent. The Welsh language is used in the morning service and English in the Sunday school and evening. Rev. Richard Powell is pastor.

Rev. E. W. Murray reports an increasing interest in the three Harrison County churches. There is a revival spirit; eight persons rose for prayers at Central on a recent Sunday. Mr. Murray has secured temporary quarters in a hall over a store at Central. In the meantime a parsonage is being built. The churches have adopted the weekly envelope plan with good results.

Prof. A. M. Hall of Butler Divinity School has resigned his work with the Disciple Church and will take a postgraduate course at Yale. He will affiliate as a Congregationalist hereafter. Professor Hall is a man of recognized force and a pulpit orator of decided ability.

Michigan.

GREENVILLE.—Rev. A. M. Hyde, the pastor, has tried for six months the plan of dividing his congregation into Workers' Unions, several in number and appropriately named. Their object is to increase fellowship among members and others and to accomplish systematic work. Each union has seven departments, each member having an assignment of special work. The divisions are watch and care, acquaintance, good cheer, employment, news, program and flower. Once a month all the departments meet separately and twice a year all meet together.

DETROIT.—The Congregational Union have given instructions for the purchase of a corner lot for the site of a new chapel to cost $1,500.——German. The pastor, Rev. Anton Huelster, has secured subscriptions of $500 to go toward the last payment of $1,750 on the building purchased last year. When the balance is secured the church will be free from debt.

THE WEST.

Missouri.

KANSAS CITY.—First. With the help of the new assistant pastor, Rev. Charles H. Fenn, who comes from the superintendency of the Children's Aid Society of Chicago, the work of this church and its pastor, Dr. Henry Hopkins, is going forward with increased earnestness. Efforts are now being made, in consultation with the masters of the city schools, to establish an Industrial School for the incorrigible boys who have drifted out of the city schools, and for the rescue of street waifs.

Minnesota.

MINNEAPOLIS.—First Scandinavian. This church has made slow advance for the past few years, being cramped by the incoming of a Lutheran church. An English-speaking Sunday school has been maintained. Rev. L. C. Johnson, who has labored faithfully for five years, has resigned and will minister to Lutherans in another State. It is believed that, with some anticipated changes, the outlook for this enterprise is hopeful.——Open Door. The pastorate of Rev. W. J. Gray has been eminently successful, church debts having been paid and the church brought to self-support, with many additions and much spiritual growth. A farewell reception was given to the pastor this week. Mr. Gray resigns on account of ill health and has been called to Everett, Wn.——Robbinsdale. The seventh anniversary was celebrated with appropriate services. A fine building, a slow but sure growth, the gradual liquidation of its debts to the Congregational Church Building Society, a flourishing Sunday school and C. E. Society and a hopeful outlook, notwithstanding the removal of some manufacturing enterprises from the village, are reported.——Fifth Avenue. Large congregations and increasing interest in all departments welcome the new pastor, Rev. J. E. Smith. Services every night for the week preceding communion are held with good attendance and profit.——Bethany. Good congregations and increasing interest, with the coming of many new families, greet the pastor. The debt has been reduced, leaving nothing but the amount due the Congregational Church Building Society, so that with lessened financial burdens the church is hopeful.——Forest Heights. Several additions since the coming of the new pastor, growing congregations, the receipt of aid from the Congregational Church Building Society and the payment of all other obligations for church building are encouraging features.——Thirty-Eighth Street. This enterprising mission has recently been organized into an independent church, several different denominations joining and securing Rev. A. P. Lyon for pastor. A building has already been erected and the work is prospering.

ELLSWORTH.—Through the assistance of a student, employed for the summer on this large field, Rev. W. J. Conard is able to give more service to the central church. The county Sunday school association held an interesting meeting here with attendance crowding the capacity of the little meeting house. This is the first religious convention ever held in the town and gave the people new views of religious work. At Ash Creek out-station the meeting house has been thoroughly renovated with paper and paint by the Ladies' Aid Society.

CORRELL.—A church of 13 members has been organized here, the only one in the place, the result of the faithful labors of two Congregational pastors who had supported preaching services here for over a year. Different denominations are represented in the little church, which for the present worships in a commodious schoolhouse. Many of the people came from the southern portion of the State and were educated in Congregational churches there.

GRANITE FALLS.—The church, depleted by removals and so discouraged that services were discontinued and the Sunday school given up last year, has made considerable advance during the pastorate of Mr. J. H. Hjetland, good congregations and a flourishing Sunday school being gathered. The ordination service June 30 was a season of Christian fellowship which greatly encouraged the little church.

WALKER.—Rev. C. B. Fellows is working temporarily in this new town on the shores of Leech Lake. Church lots have been secured, and it is hoped that a small building will be erected at once. The town has all the characteristics of a frontier community and greatly needs religious institutions.

CENTER CITY.—Swedish. A largely attended fellowship meeting was held with this church, addresses being given by Prof. J. G. Princell of Minneapolis and others. A choir of 23 members from Professor Princell's church attended. The whole meeting was productive of good.

MAPLETON AND STERLING.—Emigration from Sterling has led to the abandonment of that church and the reception of its members at Mapleton. The Sterling church was in a country community four or five miles from the railroad.

KRAGNES.—At a recent festival $44 were given as a nucleus for a church building. A subscription is being raised and the people hope to secure a building in the autumn from their meager resources.

CHOKIO.—At this promising out-station of the Graceville church a building has been erected, all the people giving liberally and no aid being asked of the C. C. B. S. An organization will come later.

BARNESVILLE.—Rev. L. C. Frost has preached for a few months at a promising out-station in the country, where a branch church will be organized in the course of a few weeks.

Nebraska.

GRAFTON.—Mr. J. H. Andress, who has been supplying here for nearly two years, in connection with his studies at Doane College, closed his work June 28, to enter Chicago Theological Seminary. At a largely attended reception on the previous evening many appreciative words were spoken of the good work Mr. Andress had done, and the Y. P. S. C. E. had already presented him with a testimonial of its esteem. The church was discouraged when Mr. Andress came to the field, but his earnest words and work prepared the way for the revival last winter. The membership has doubled and is united and strong. Rev. A. A. Cressman of Fairmont will supply the church Sunday afternoons until Sept. 1, and after that will have pastoral charge in connection with field work for Doane College.

CALHOUN AND DE SOTO.—The pastor, Rev. S. A. Parker, maintains three out-stations efficiently. Mr. J. S. Chase, a well-beloved elder in the Presbyterian church at Seattle, Wn., who has been spending some time at Calhoun on account of his wife's health, has been of great service in this Sunday school and in the out-stations. Mr. and Mrs. Chase, Mr. Parker and a strong horse who carries them from point to point form a well-known and welcome quartet.

FRIEND.—Rev. A. N. Dean, who supplies here while continuing his residence at Crete, is encouraged by a constantly increasing interest, consequent upon the faithful and earnest presentation of the old and familiar truths of the gospel. Five persons were received into the church June 28, all on confession; two were also received at the previous communion.

BLADEN.—Rev. W. A. Davies, besides ministering to this church and those of Campbell and Upland, maintains two important out-stations. In one of these, known as District 43, Franklin County, Sunday baseball has been largely the attraction on Sunday afternoons, but now the Sunday school and preaching service have the attention of the community.

Mr. Frank H. Heydenburk of Oberlin Seminary, in addition to taking care of the churches of Strang and Shickley for the summer, will preach alternate Sunday afternoons at Bruning.

North Dakota.

DICKINSON.—Rev. G. W. Gallagher is prospering in his work here. His congregations are large and growing. He earnestly pleads for a helper at the out-stations, but the State H. M. S. has no money to aid in the support of an assistant. A large part of his important and growing field is now wholly uncared for.

ROSE VALLEY.—This is the banner Sunday school in the State in its offering for Sunday school missionary work, its contribution of $20 making the honored pastor a life member of the C. S. S. and P. S.

GLEN ULLIN.—Rev. and Mrs. F. C. Emerson are doing excellent work, involving many sacrifices. Beside his pastoral duties he has finished the parsonage with his own hands.

The meeting house at Carrington is undergoing repairs and a parsonage is being built.

South Dakota.

CLARK.—Rev. T. G. Langdale presented his resignation June 28, to take effect Oct. 1. He came to the church five years ago and leaves it united and strengthened. He spends July at his old home in Cincinnati, O., and attends the C. E. convention in Washington. Mr. Langdale is president of the South Dakota C. E. Union.

DE SMET.—Rev. E. J. Sarkis, the pastor, plans to return to Syria, his native land, in the fall. Nearly 50 members have been added during the year.

The church at Aberdeen has purchased a new site and is preparing to build. Senator Kyle, a former pastor, still retains membership here.——Evangelists Thompson and Gamble have just closed a successful 10 days' meeting at Wakonda.

PACIFIC COAST.

California.

NILES.—Rev. Dr. J. C. Holbrook, 88 years old, spoke on Children's Day. Each child present carried a beautiful bouquet and, as the reverend gentleman closed, all gathered around him and presented the flowers.

SAN FRANCISCO.—Rev. Jee Gam is speaking wherever opportunity offers in behalf of the new building the Chinese are trying to secure.

The church in Tulare has been presented with a beautiful pulpit by Mr. E. C. Beals.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR NOTES.

Labrador now has Christian Endeavor Societies.

Some foreign societies that cannot be represented at Washington have sent their national flags to be displayed.

The missionary committee of a Jamaica Plain, Mass., society gives at each meeting in two minutes the recent missionary tidings.

The Oklahoma convention passed strong resolutions for Sunday observance which will be published with the laws on the subject.

Washington Endeavorers are trying to secure a steam launch to use on Puget Sound in carrying on their work in connection with the floating societies.

During the summer the north division of the Chicago Union will hold two open air meetings at 8.30 A. M. every Sunday morning, one at the barns of the street car company.

Two delegates to the Mexican national convention at Zacatecas walked there from Guadalajara, more than 200 miles, in the intense heat, because they could not afford to pay the fare. They did good all along their way by acting as colporteurs.

The Hawaiian first national convention, just held, filled a church edifice capable of holding 800 persons. The Chinese, Japanese and other nationalities were represented among the delegates, and the outlook for Christian Endeavor seems to be excellent.

From the president's report at the annual meeting of the United Society it appeared that Dr. Clark has traveled during the past year more than 37,000 miles and has spoken to Endeavor audiences in 20 States, four of the provinces of Canada and five Mexican States.

For July the members of the World's Prayer Chain are asked to pray that the fellowship typified by the Christian Endeavor movement, based on fidelity to Christ and loyalty to one's own church, may prevail, and that it may be greatly promoted by the International Convention at Washington.

In the course of six months the floating society at Portland, Me., made 26 visits to vessels and 75 to the seamen's boarding houses, held 13 services at the Marine Hospital, and distributed at the hospital and on vessels 1,600 tracts, and more than 2 500 papers. As a result 40 members were added to the society, and seven persons asked for prayers at the meetings.

Arrangements with a newspaper syndicate have been made by the officers of the New York State Union, so that plates containing full reports of the convention can be furnished daily to all newspapers of the State. The president of the Maine Union intends to go through the eastern and central part of that State for some weeks after the convention, giving reports of it.

"A converts' sociable" was planned by an English pastor to bring about a closer acquaintance between the members of the society and a number of young persons that had been received into the church after a revival. In addition to the social features appropriate topics were treated, such as The Convert at Work, The Convert at Divine Service, The Convert at Bible Study.

The society in the State prison at Eddyville sent to the Kentucky convention a message and reported that in eight months their membership had risen from 35 to 75. After the convention 80 delegates visited the prison and were heartily welcomed. A service attended by about 500 prisoners was held in the chapel, which had been decorated in honor of the occasion. The evangelistic service lasted about two hours and the greatest interest was shown. More than 100 persons promised to read the Bible every day. There were more than 200 responses to a call for those who wanted to lead better lives.

The British national convention at Bristol was a splendid success, the attendance equaling that at Birmingham last year, although the situation was much less favorable. Forty or fifty separate meetings were held, and the participation in the open meetings was brisk. An appeal for missionary volunteers was made in a letter from the grandson of William Carey, and the number of those offering themselves was large. Every reference to the Armenians met an instant and hearty response. The societies in Great Britain now number 3,609, and of these 964 were formed the past year. Of the associate members, 7,278 became active. The Baptists are still the leading denomination in number of societies, as they have 947, the Congregationalists are second with 933, the Methodists have 751 and the Presbyterians 311.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

REV. SIMEON FOSTER WOODIN.

Mr. Woodin was born in Hinsdale, N. Y., May 11, 1833, graduated from Williams College in 1855 and from Union Theological Seminary in 1859. He sailed immediately for Foo Chow, China, under the auspices of the American Board, and remained in this field, respected and esteemed by all who knew him for his faithful, laborious, self-sacrificing service, until May, 1895. His death occurred recently in Amenia, N. Y.

OUR readers will be interested to note the great reduction in the price of the Electropoise, from $25 to $10. The advertisement on another page tells all about it.

A PERFECT VACATION LAND—VERMONT.—Among the picturesque localities there is none more charming than the Green Mountains region of Vermont. The massive verdure clad hills which are grouped under the name of the Green Mountain range run about midway between the Connecticut River on the east and the valley of Lake Champlain on the west, and with their foothills give picturesque character to the entire State, which derives its name from them. Within a few years this region has been greatly developed as a vacation resort, and the fame of its beautiful scenery and healthful climate has spread until today it occupies a conspicuous place among the famous summering sections of New England. A handsome book of more than 100 pages, just issued by the passenger department of the Central Vermont Railroad, describes in an entertaining manner the charms of the green hills. Summer Homes is the title of the book, and it may be had for a five-cent stamp to cover postage on application to S. W. Cummings, G. P. A., St. Albans, Vt., or T. H. Hanley, 260 Washington Street, Boston.

TAKE
Take the best when you buy medicine. Do not experiment. Take no substitute that may be offered for Hood's Sarsaparilla, whether old or new. Hood's Sarsaparilla possesses curative power unknown to any other medicine. It has a record of cures never equaled. It has power to make your blood pure and in this way it can make you well. Remember
HOOD'S Sarsaparilla
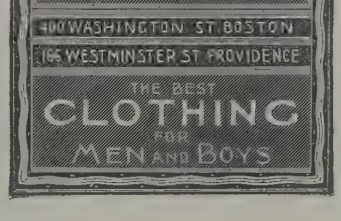
Is the best—in fact the One True Blood Purifier.
Hood's Pills are the only pills to take with Hood's Sarsaparilla.



OF CHINESE GRASS.

One of the most interesting things in our Exhibition of Art Stained Willow Furniture is the collection of Chinese Grass Furniture, of which a single chair is here presented.

It is made of twisted coils of a stout, grassy reed, and is as durable as rattan, with even greater flexibility. It yields gently to the weight of the sitter, and is exceedingly luxurious.

The color is a Tea shade, with the cross sections of dark green, and the harmony is perfect. The grass is mildly odorous, having the same flavor as "sweet grass."

Remember that this furniture is made in China. You buy it at the proverbially low cost of Chinese labor. It is ridiculously inexpensive.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

There has been no important change in the situation of general trade. The movement is dull; it is waiting for the uncertainties now harassing men's minds to clear away and leave a substantial foundation upon which to base operations. The great uncertainty, which troubles more than any other, the currency question, is not likely to be finally disposed of until next November at the elections, for it seems to be the settled conviction that the Chicago convention will declare for and nominate a free silver candidate.

Traveling men are now out on the road, and it will be impossible to tell how the fall trade is going to be until mail advices and orders are received from the drummers, which ought to come in in about three or four weeks. At present it is between seasons, with dullness ruling in all lines of industry, so dull that curtailment has been resorted to in many directions. Money rates are quoted a little firmer and lenders are more conservative, and will remain so while doubt as to the future of the currency exists. The stock market is feverish and reflects the uncertainties in the situation.

SHAMROCKS.

"Shure, and it's mesilf that dhreamed about you last noight, Misther Williams," said Bridget, with a beaming smile. "Oi dhreamed that you and Missus Williams came here to see me, and says you, 'How are you off for tay and coffee, Bridget?' and Oi says, 'Its niver a drop of ayther Oi've got in the house, Misther Williams!' And thin you presinted me wid a pound of tay, and Missus Williams wid a pound of coffee on the shpot! Yis, sorr, that was me dhream."

"Well, Bridget," said the minister, striving not to smile, "you know dreams are said to go by contraries."

"Shure, and that's fwhat Oi said to mesilf," exclaimed Bridget, triumphantly. "Said Oi, Misther Williams is the wan that'll be giving me the coffee and Missus Williams the tay.' Thim was me very thoughts, sorr."—Youth's Companion.

A gentleman visiting a wild beast show saw a countryman come in, bearing unmistakable signs of having had a glass too much. A tiger scratched the back of the hand with which the man grasped a bar of the cage. The laceration was severe and the pain great. The sufferer danced about and twirled his shillalah, crying, "Let him out, let him out, till I have me will av him." A companion tried to soothe the irate dancer with this neat impromptu: "Niver mind, Pat! Sure he only wanted to shcrape acquaintance wid ye!" —Westminster Gazette.

A CLEAN CHEAT.

Discordant and emphatic sounds were issuing from the private chamber of Mr. O'Hooligan.

"Phwativer is th' matther wid yez, Pat?" inquired his faithful spouse.

"Matther enough!" quoth Pat. "Shure, whin Oi bought this cursed plasther Oi thought Oi hod a bargain; but now, begorra! Oi know Oi'm shkinned."—Judge.

AN UNLIMITED REPERTOIRE.

Mr. Dountown (irritably): "Bridget, I must insist that you cease singing that song. My wife has a nervous headache and it annoys her."

Bridget: "Oi will shtop, sorr. Oi didn't know thot the mishtress disloiked thot song. Pfwhat song do she want me to sing, sorr?"—Judge.

NO DARNING IN HEAVEN.

Mother of Nine: "Well, Bridget, I am quite sure we sha'n't have to darn stockings in heaven after ten o'clock at night."

Bridget: "Shure, an' that's thrue for you, ma'am, for all the pictures av angels that iver I saw was barefutted."—Youth's Companion.

CURRENT THOUGHT.

AT HOME.

The Churchman's handling of the utterance of the Presbyterian General Assembly at Saratoga in dissolving its committee on church union is interesting. It considers that the Presbyterian claim of parity rests on a misconception: "An acknowledgment of parity and equality, or an interchange of pulpits, have never tended in the least toward unity. The prominence into which such accidents of unity as this are thrust argues a missing of the main points at stake. We must go deeper than this, or, rather, we must go in a different direction." Then, constructively, it proceeds: "All baptized persons were baptized into the one church. From this point of view, which doubtless impressed the Presbyterian fathers at Saratoga, all thus professing Christ stand on an equal footing as members of his church. The oneness of the church in regard to its baptized members is a truth which is often lost sight of."

Insisting upon this underlying organic unity, which it believes is often lost sight of by the baptized themselves, but which, in spite of all disorganization, still exists for all believers, if only they will claim their share in it, The Churchman continues: "The Protestant Episcopal Church does not claim to be a church in the sense that it is the one church. Its members belong to the same great church of the baptized to which the Presbyterians also belong. But what the Protestant Episcopal Church does claim is that it has never given up the principle of organic unity which makes division, separation and denominationalism impossible. . . . We sincerely wish the learned members of the Assembly to understand that the Protestant Episcopal Church admits their oneness, their equality in baptism, and only desires to share with them and their section of the church the organic unity which is not the especial possession of the Protestant Episcopal Church, but is also the basis on which Presbyterians may muster their twelve divisions and, with all other denominations and with the Protestant Episcopal Church, become united with the church of the apostles and prophets, whose chief corner stone is Christ."

To this we may add for comparison and contrast two passages from the recent encyclical letter of the pope: "'Wherefore Christ instituted in the church a living, authoritative and lasting magisterium. He willed and commended under the gravest penalties that its teachings should be received as if they were his own. As often, therefore, as it is declared on the authority of this teaching that this or that is contained in the deposit of divine revelation it must be believed by every one as true.' The very nature of divine faith makes it impossible that we can reject even one point of direct teaching, as this is practically rejecting the authority of God himself. . . . The dispensation of the divine mysteries was not granted by God indiscriminately to all Christians, but to the apostles and their successors, and in this way, according to God's providence, a duly constituted society was formed out of the divided multitudes of peoples. As 'no true and perfect human society can be conceived which is not governed by some supreme authority,' so Christ of necessity gave to his church a supreme authority to which all Christians must be obedient. For the preservation of unity there must be unity of government jure divino, and men may be placed outside the one fold by schism as well as by heresy.

"The nature of this supreme authority can be ascertained from the positive and evident will of Christ on the matter. As he willed that his kingdom should be visible Christ was obliged to designate a vicegerent on earth in the person of St. Peter. He also determined that the authority given to him for the salvation of mankind in perpetuity should be inherited by St. Peter's successors."

ABROAD.

The New Age (London) remarks that John Bull is "a patient and tolerant person, but he does not like the idea of paying large salaries to his servants to enable them to keep up racing studs and gambling hells. . . . What will future generations think of the moral and social condition of England at the close of the nineteenth century, when the historians will have to record that the heir to the throne, the ex-prime minister [Lord Roseberry] and the chairman [Lord Londonderry] of the greatest of our educational organizations were amongst the chief patrons of our annual saturnalia of gambling, drunkenness and greed." The Christian World, also commenting on the Prince of Wales's recent victory at Epsom, where his horse won the Derby, says: "It is impossible to repress or disguise the astonishment we feel that one who evidently has the welfare of the nation at heart should continue, by his influence and example, to encourage a system which makes the betting ring more like the mouth of hell than any place on earth."

Rev. Hugh Price Hughes minces no words in his Methodist Times leader on Mr. Gladstone's letter to the pope: "If Leo XIII. can be moved, as is probable in the case of a man of his character and age, by the most cunning flattery, Mr. Gladstone's pathetic and abject appeal to him will stay his hand. It is an extraordinary spectacle to see a Christian Englishman, who has been first minister of the crown, imploring the pope of Rome at least not to decide against the validity of English orders! This is not the temper which animated our ancestors at any period of our national history of which Englishmen have reason to be proud. There are many signs, however, that the manliness, self-respect and mental healthfulness of the English character have experienced some subtle change. The portentous growth of wealth, luxury and self-indulgence have apparently eaten into the very fiber of the modern Englishman's soul."

The ominous fact, vouched for by the Railway Age, is, that since the panic of 1893–96 began, railways in this country with a mileage of 44,350 miles and capital of nearly $3,000,000,000 have confessed bankruptcy. Bradstreet's reports 7,602 business failures during the last six months, with liabilities of $105,535,936.

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER

A Powerful and Permanent Nerve Tonic.

Dr. M. H. HOUSTON, Physician to Randolph-Macon College, Ashland, Va.
(Extract from a communication in the Virginia Medical Monthly.)

"Having had an opportunity of watching very closely the action of BUFFALO LITHIA WATER, Spring No. 2, in numerous cases which have fallen under my observation, I am prepared to impute to it one quality at least to which, it strikes me, sufficient attention has not been heretofore directed. I allude especially to its power as a gentle excitant of the Nervous System, and as a powerful and permanent Nerve Tonic. To this particular property I am disposed to attribute much of its efficacy in the relief of many chronic diseases. Other mineral waters, with exhilarating properties, are sparkling in their appearance, and their exciting qualities are due to the gases which are disengaged, and which are, consequently, evanescent in effect. The BUFFALO LITHIA WATER is without such impregnation of gases, and its effects are much more permanent."

This Water is for sale by druggists and grocers generally, or in cases of one dozen half-gallon bottles, $5.00 f. o. b. at the Springs. Descriptive pamphlets sent free to any address.

REV. C. E. MILLIKEN.

Mr. Milliken was born in Fitzwilliam, N. H., sixty-six years ago. In youth he learned the cabinetmaker's trade and worked in Keene. Here he was called first to the life of a Christian disciple and then to the work of the ministry. He fitted for college and graduated from Dartmouth and from Andover. In 1860 he was ordained and installed as pastor of the Congregational church in Littleton, N. H., where he remained, trusted and beloved, for nearly twenty years. In 1879 he removed to Maynard, Mass., and continued until the summer of 1892 when he resigned his pastorate and went abroad for an extended tour. He traveled over Great Britain and the Continent, went to Egypt and then spent several months in Palestine. Returning to America, he was called to the church in Penacook, N. H., in 1884, and ministered until the spring of 1891, when the church in Swanzey, N. H., invited him to become its pastor, and here he wrought until he heard the voice saying "Come up hither." The summons came to him Sunday morning, June 14, while he was in the pulpit. He was assisted to his house and tarried until the following Tuesday, when he followed the voice that called him home.

The churches which he served and all his brethren in the ministry would say,

Servant of God, well done!
Rest from thy loved employ;
The battle fought, the victory won,
Enter thy Master's joy.

For he was a good man, full of faith and of the Holy Ghost. He submitted meekly to the discipline of life, and it drew him nearer to God. He was sound in doctrine but fonder of letters than of theology, and loved the things of the Spirit most of all. One only needed to talk with him and hear him pray to discover how strong his faith, how clear his vision, how bright his hope and how close his walk with God were. Never aspiring to the display of scholarship in his sermons, he never allowed himself to be careless but did his work conscientiously and addressed himself to the real needs of his congregation. He administered the affairs of his churches with discretion, and they were frequently blessed with revivals. He delighted also in Christian fellowship and was a regular attendant of ministerial association meetings, county conferences, Sunday school conventions and Bible meetings, and he frequently went up to the annual gatherings of his denomination and to the conventions of the Young Men's Christian Association and of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor that he might listen to the discussion of the wider concerns of the kingdom. And he believed that the advantages of such assemblies were gathered by those who were present at the hour appointed for the opening of the first session and remained to receive the benediction which closed the last session.

Mr. Milliken was thrice married and as many times called to part with his beloved, who preceded him to the world beyond. The death of an only daughter, who died in early womanhood, added to his sorrows. Two sons remain, and he had the great joy of seeing one of these, Charles D., set apart to the work of the ministry and installed as pastor of the Congregational church in Canaan, Ct., where he still labors. The younger son, Edward, is yet in his teens. C. E. H.

HARRIETT SAMPSON DAY

Died at Auburndale, July 2, in her eighty sixth year. She was the widow of the late Sherebiah B. Day of West Springfield. Two daughters survive her, Mrs. Addison P. Foster of Roxbury and Mrs. Joseph S. Hunt of Auburndale. Mrs. Day was descended from the Pilgrim Fathers—Abraham Sampson, Miles Standish, George Soule, William Molines and John Alden being among her ancestors in the original Plymouth Colony. She inherited many of the characteristics of these sturdy nation builders. She had strong religious convictions and a well ordered and positive conscience. She was remarkable for her interest in political affairs. Up to the very last she read her daily paper and two religious weekly papers regularly. She understood far more of national matters than many an intelligent voter. She studied the great questions of the day, had definite opinions upon them and was able to give her reasons. She lived a happy and consistent Christian life and, although for some years closely confined to her house, took a warm interest in the church at Auburndale of which she was a member. She was a constant Bible student, for many years invariably reading through the Bible every year.

For Mind Tiredness
Use Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

Dr. S. W. OLEY, Danbury, Ct., says: "I have used it in mind tiredness from overwork, dyspepsia and nervous conditions, and found it always very beneficial."

YOUNG mothers should early learn the necessity of keeping on hand a supply of Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk for nursing babies as well as for general cooking. It has stood the test for 30 years and its value is recognized.

PURIFY your blood with Hood's Sarsaparilla, which will give you an appetite, tone your stomach and strengthen your nerves.

POND'S EXTRACT, the household remedy for pain. Beware of imitations weak and sour.

CHINESE GRASS.—An interesting novelty in connection with the display of art stained willow furniture at the Paine warerooms, on Canal Street, is a collection of Chinese grass furniture. This, as its name implies, is made of woven grass, and is as tough as rattan furniture, and will last through a dozen years of severe usage. It is very inexpensive, and even more luxurious than ordinary willow furniture. It comes in charming colors.

HE CAUGHT AT A STRAW.

And Found a Bulwark of Strength and Safety.

C. B. Downs, of the freight department of the Boston & Maine Railroad at Portsmouth, knows what it is to suffer from hunger with food within reach, which he could eat, but not digest. He lives at 39 Daniel Street, and tells his experience in the following words:—

When I was 14 years old I began to be troubled with indigestion, which as I grew up became worse instead of better, until I found it hard to keep any food on my stomach. Everything I ate caused me pain and distress, but I did not look like a dyspeptic and so did not get much sympathy.

I tried as many as a dozen different things, but they all failed to cure me, and like a drowning man I was ready to catch at any straw offering the least hope of rescue. Then I tried Puritana and was not only relieved by it from the pain, but in a short time completely cured of my indigestion. I could eat sausages without their hurting me, and I found that Puritana had given me a new stomach that would digest any food. I believe that I was the first person in Portsmouth to use Puritana, but not the last, as I know that since then many people have taken it, with wonderful results.

James H. Crowley, of Concord, N. H., is not only an athlete but one of the fastest amateur runners in the State. What he says below shows how a man's strength will go if the stomach is not right.

I had dyspepsia for years. Sometimes I could hardly stand up, and I could not eat anything without pain and agony. Of course I tried to get relief, but met with failure after failure until there seemed to be no hope left. At last I was persuaded to give Puritana a trial. The result was marvelous. It not only relieved me, but it made me perfectly well. Instead of being doubled up with pain, Puritana has given me a stomach like an ostrich, that will digest almost anything. There is nothing too strong for me to say in favor of Puritana.

THE CONGREGATIONALIST

Boston Thursday 16 July 1896

NATURE'S LOVER

HE loves to lie beneath the sky
When summer days are sweet,
Where sunbeams play and branches sway,
Apart from dust and heat;
And silent see the honey-bee
Flit by with burdened thighs,
A busy thing of tireless wing
And eager argus eyes.

He loves to hear the wren anear,
The oriole above,
The warbling thrush that bends the rush,
The plaintive wild-wood dove.
Of every flower in mead and bower
The mystic creed he knows,
Why lilies grow as white as snow,
And why so red the rose.

His dearest books are fields and brooks,
His sweetest song the sea;
His store of gold the woods unfold
Through autumn's alchemy.
Some beauty still on plain or hill
His tender heart enchains
When frost elves weave their wreaths, and leave
Their etchings on the panes.

Though like the flight of birds at night
The wingéd years speed on,
And eyes that brim with light grow dim
And ruddy cheeks grow wan,
He still doth dream of dale and stream
Where lovingly he trod;
Who so hath been to nature kin
Must needs be near to God.

THREE MORE RINGING BACCALAUREATE UTTERANCES.

UNSELFISH EDUCATED MEN.

The danger for the mass lies in their own ignorance, or half-ignorance, or half-knowledge and the blindness which may lead them to trust in selfish or deceitful guides. The observation of the public life at this moment makes manifest the threatening character of the danger. The influence of the educated men who are not selfish is the need of the hour and of the generation. Whoever else may deceive or go astray, you must not deceive. Whoever else may be thoughtless of his influence, y u must be thoughtful.—President Dwight of Yale.

THE OPEN MIND AND GOD'S MESSAGE.

What is our duty? It is, first of all, to listen for the voice of God. Does God speak? If there is a God he surely speaks. Does God speak today? If he spoke in times past, he speaks today. The occasions are as many, the need is as great. His nature has not changed, nor has man's nature changed. To whom does he speak? To every one who listens, to every one who opens heart and mind to hear, to every one whose soul has received even the slightest glimpse of the divine word. But how does he speak, and how shall we hear? He speaks through the men of ancient days, whose lives and words were the voice of God, a voice which still speaks, which is all the more clear because the history of centuries has attested the genuineness of the message. He speaks through the great events of history; these furnish us a voice of warning as well as a voice of promise. His voice is heard in the revelations of all science, a certain and divine message, the mysteries of which are now beginning to be understood. The voice may be heard speaking through the laws of mind, as well as of matter. In the laws of life and thought we discover a voice which, more than any other perhaps, is the voice of God. But all these voices blend in the life and teaching of one who spoke centuries ago and still speaks; for all, the voice of God as spoken through Jesus of Nazareth is simple and sufficient. How shall we listen? By training eye and ear to be sensitive to every impression, by training head and heart to be touched by every message which bears the divine seal.—President Harper of Chicago University.

PSEUDO-PATRIOTISM.

True patriotism is one of the highest and holiest qualities possible to man. To be a patriot is the next best thing to being a Christian, and if one is a Christian patriotism is one of the chief forms in which his Christianity will manifest itself. For Christianity, as we have seen so often, is essentially the life of unselfish devotion to objective and universal ends; and among the ends which this universal life includes one's country must ever take the first and foremost place. . . . False patriotism is a feeble imitation of some other nation, or else it is a faint echo of bygone conditions. Both kinds of this imitative, second-hand pseudo-patriotism are rife and rampant today. The jingo is the pseudo-patriot who wants to imitate other nations. The A. P. A. is a pseudo-patriotic order that seeks to revive an outworn animosity. . . . Just such a crisis as comes in the life of every young man confronts the nation now. Shall we be what Providence in giving us this broad land, with the ocean on either side and conditions of climate to the north and south which refuse to support a formidable rival, manifestly intended us to be—a solver of the social problems of an industrial age; an example to all the nations of the dignity and splendor and prosperity and power of peace? Or shall we squander our resources and debauch our minds and harden our hearts in order to gratify the empty pride of being reckoned a formidable fighter and to indulge the childish fondness for passing blustering resolutions?—President William De Witt Hyde at Bowdoin.

EDUCATION.

—— Rev. William Gallagher, Ph. D., for ten years principal of Williston Seminary at Easthampton, Mass., has accepted the head mastership of the Thayer Academy at Braintree.

—— The New England Chautauqua Sunday School Assembly at Lakeview, South Framingham, Mass., will open, July 20, with a lecture by Rev. Russell H. Conwell, D. D. Among the other speakers will be Rev. George A. Gordon, D. D., Prof. W. A. Scott of Madison University, Booker T. Washington, Mrs. Mary A. Livermore, Chaplain W. H. Milburn, D. D., and D. L. Moody. There will be daily normal class instruction in Bible and Sunday school science under Rev. J. L. Hurlbut, D. D., assisted by Prof G. W. Pease.

—— An increased number of students and a higher degree of excellence marked the exercises of Commencement week at the Wilton German-English College. The vice-president, Prof. E. Mannhardt, preached the baccalaureate sermon in German, and Rev. G. L. Cady of Geneseo, Ill., delivered an admirable Commencement address in English, taking as his theme Secrets of Success, considered under the heads, Courage, Character, Christ. Twelve graduates from the academic course took part in the Commencement exercises, nine speaking in English and three in German. Other features of the week were the recital of the Conservatory of Music, the Commencement concert, a prize oratorical contest and a banquet provided by the citizens of Wilton. The quality of the year's work affords gratification to the trustees and proves the importance of this missionary college for our German citizens.

ALL the people should keep themselves healthy and especial care should be given to this matter at this time. Health depends upon pure, rich blood, for when the blood is impure and impoverished diseases of various kinds are almost certain to result. The one true blood purifier is Hood's Sarsaparilla. By its power to purify and vitalize the blood it has proved itself to be the safeguard of health, and the record of remarkable cures effected proves that it has wonderful power over disease. It actually and permanently cures when all other preparations fail to do any good whatever.

Steps for Beginners.

A Manual of instruction for persons seeking the Way of Life and admission into the membership of the Church of our Lord Jesus Christ. By ASHER ANDERSON. Paper. Pp. 69. 12 cents; $10 per 100 copies.

Mr. Anderson's little volume is the result of his own practical experience in preparing young people to enter the membership of the church. It is a simply written little manual, free from theological technicalities, but full of suggestion and very clear in its pointing out of the great fundamentals of Christian truth. Some pastors prefer to prepare their own course of instruction for such persons as they can reach in this way, but there will be many others who can use Mr. Anderson's manual to good advantage, and no one who is interested in work of this kind can fail to be helped by a reading and careful study of the book. It is a good thing, too, to be put into the hands of any one who is beyond the reach of immediate personal effort, but who may be led by the clear statements of the manual to find with its aid the greatest of all blessings.

ANOTHER great rallying of international Christian Endeavor forces serves as a fresh reminder of the enduring vitality of the movement and of its immense influence for good. Though the convention was smaller than last year's in this city, the enthusiasm, spirituality and the quality of the platform speaking as a whole reached the high standards which previous gatherings have attained. Meeting in the national capital, it was fitting that special emphasis should be laid upon the duties and problems of citizenship. We are glad to note the unusual prominence of subjects relating to the deepening of the individual Christian life.

The death of Mr. Anson D. F. Randolph, July 6, makes a sad break in a wide circle of religious and literary friends for whom his New York bookstore has long been a delightfully attractive center. His vein of genuine humor, his genial temper, his large acquaintance with literature, his exhaustless fund of anecdote made his sanctum not unlike that of the late James T. Fields of Boston, though with a larger infusion of the ministerial element in the circle. The late Dr. W. M. Taylor was his frequent and delighted visitor. Connected with the book business for more than half a century, he was widely known by bookish men all over the land, who have greatly valued and relied on his judgment as to the probable success of works seeking publication. His taste in the manufacture of books was unsurpassed. Indeed, he may be regarded as the originator of the modern style of making books, particularly religious books, outwardly attractive. Devout in spirit and fond of poetry, his various collections of devotional works, often containing, anonymously, pieces of his own, have been spiritually helpful to thousands of God's people. His own poems, not a few of which he has given to the public in The Congregationalist, had in them the true poetic ring as well as deeply Christian experience, and will live long in many a believer's memory. The wife of his youth preceded him by but a few weeks to the heavenly mansions, of which their earthly home was a sweet and blessed foretaste.

The New York Observer is constrained to explain at length just what is meant when, on May 21, it said: "The whole tendency of the gospel is to abase man and to exalt God." Upon reading which we said: "The whole tendency of the gospel is to redeem man and thus to glorify God." Agreeing with much that the Observer says now in defense of its position, we must still protest against the original statement and its supplement: "Man is really up in the the scale of being only when he is in the dust of an utter self-abnegation. . . . Man is debased unless he is abased." Self-appraisement, leading to hatred of sin, contrition, humility, desire for pardon, are the result of every man's contact with the gospel of God's love as revealed in Jesus Christ, but there is nothing in the gospel that calls upon man to grovel, or to lose his self-respect, before he can be a disciple of Christ. Such a theory of salvation is more the product of the ratiocinations of Augustine and John Calvin than it is the product of the study of the gospels, or obedience to the promptings of the Holy Spirit.

Public school teachers will be interested in the outcome of the trial of a Dr. Keeton of Ravensword, Ill., who was arrested for assaulting the principal of one of the local schools, with intent to kill. The defendant was found guilty, subjected to a fine and kept in the county jail one night. He had been offended because his son had not been advanced more rapidly and claimed that he had been kept back out of spite on the part of the principal. The examination papers submitted to the court disproved this charge. With no other provocation the doctor went to the schoolhouse, entered the principal's private room, struck him violently and unexpectedly and threatened, as affirmed, to kill him. There was a great deal of interest in the case. Not infrequently teachers are threatened with bodily injury by parents of unruly or stupid children. Had Dr. Keeton been acquitted it might have proved a serious precedent. A severe penalty was not desired, and in view of the fact that the truth of the charges was admitted, although with no expression of sorrow, a slight penalty was satisfactory to those whose interests are protected by it.

THE NATIONAL PERIL.

In our issue of May 25, commenting on the political outlook, we expressed the hope that the action of the Republican and Democratic national conventions would be such as to give the voters of the nation an opportunity to face a "vital issue, even though it shatter old, honored, but nearly defunct parties"; and we ventured the prophecy that if such a vital issue were presented an answer would be given which would cause the nation "to emerge triumphantly on a new era of prosperity and be thankful for the darkness that preceded the dawn." Little did we dream how clean-cut, disintegrating and vital the issue was to be, or how thorough and dramatic the process of disintegration and reintegration.

In June the Republicans met at St. Louis, faced the question of monetary standards squarely and unequivocally declared in favor of the gold standard, pending international agreement on bimetallism. Last week the Democratic national convention in turn declared in favor of bimetallism but practically in favor of the silver standard, irrespective of international agreement.

Had it stopped there the Democratic convention would have taken a position sufficiently revolutionary and have formulated an issue distinct and vital enough to have merited the most thoughtful consideration and resolute action of every patriot. But it did not. Led by men who may be sincere but who certainly are not wise, they committed the party to such theories of government as may fairly be described as revolutionary and subversive of law and order.

So much so, too, that the issue now is not whether the candidates are statesmen, not whether the demonetization of silver by the United States in 1873 was a willful or unintentional wronging of the debtor and enriching of the creditor class, not whether gold has appreciated and if so whether it has caused low prices, not whether the United States can by its fiat make fifty-three cents of silver worth 100 cents in gold, not whether the tariff should be for revenue only or for protection as well, although these are aspects of the problem which must be, and will be, considered, but the issue now is whether our national obligations to foreign and native creditors are to be repudiated, whether the Executive is to be deprived of all power to defend the national credit in times of stress or popular madness, whether the Federal authority is to be supreme when State or local authority fails to cope with organized lawlessness, whether the Federal judiciary is to be honored and kept secure in its life tenure, subject always to good behavior, whether the civil service is again to become the prey of the spoilsman, in short, whether a revolution backward is to begin, which would set at naught the principles which underlie the Republic and civilization.

In the presence of such a common foe, no wonder men are sinking past partisan differences, and, as in 1860, joining to save national honor and the fruits of individual toil and thrift.

The present is no time for calling names, for arousing sectional or class animosities, or for impugning motives. Facts and arguments must be faced and weighed. A campaign of education must be waged. This done, be the strife ever so strenuous, truth and right will conquer, and the verdict be unquestioned and obeyed.

THE DOSHISHA AND THE MISSION IN JAPAN.

We have received a copy of the "letter addressed to the members of the Prudential Committee of the A. B. C. F. M. from the president of the Doshisha," dated at Kyoto, Japan, April, 1896. It contains a criticism of and reply to the report of the American Board's deputation to Japan, and is further supplemented by official action of the Trustees of the Doshisha reported in another column by our Japanese correspondent.

In order to make the matter clear to our readers we may recall that the Doshisha was founded as a Christian university by Joseph Hardy Neesima with the aid of funds collected in America and that it has ever since had the counsel and financial aid of the American Board. Mr. Neesima inserted in the constitution of the institution a distinct declaration of its Christian basis. Article III. reads, "Christianity is the foundation of the moral education promoted by this corporation," and on this point there is entire agreement between the trustees and the mission, the difference arising only in regard to the interpretation of the word Christianity.

Mr. Neesima was not content that the institution should be a mere theological training school, but began as he could to develop the curriculum on all sides, and this policy has been carried out, with the entire sympathy of the mission, by the trustees since his death. Of late, however, it has seemed to the missionaries and to many of the Japanese pastors that the Christian influence of the school has suffered by the presence in the faculty of men whose public teaching is pronouncedly anti-Christian or anti-evangelical, and the trustees have distinctly refused to define the Christianity of the foundation so as to insure its including such necessary Christian doctrines as the personality of God, the divinity of Christ and the future life. This leaves room for a recrudescence of the pantheistic elements which are universal in unevangelized Japanese thought, while the refusal to make the definition was based upon the ground that Christians differ and that to make any such limitation of Christianity was to identify the institution with a denomination.

The other serious difficulty related to property originally bought with money contributed by the American Board for the use of its missionaries, some of whom were teachers in the Doshisha. Japanese law forbids foreigners to buy or lease land outside the treaty ports. It became necessary, therefore, to put the title to property which the mission purchased in the name of Japanese subjects. After the bitter anti-foreign political campaign of 1892, however, these nominal holders of the title became alarmed and begged that they might be relieved of the responsibility, which was then transferred to the trustees of the Doshisha, leaving, as before, only an equitable right in houses in Kyoto occupied by missionaries and missionary teachers to the mission. This equitable right the trustees through their treasurer have since expressly and in writing declined to recognize, assuming that the houses were built for foreign teachers in the Doshisha and allowing their use to other missionaries only as a token of gratitude and good will to the American Board for its assistance.

The time has evidently come for a final readjustment of the relations of the mission and the school. In regard to the property, to which the Doshisha has an unquestioned legal right, but upon which the mission has a moral claim, the trustees have at last, by the action quoted in the article of our Japanese correspondent, consented to recognize this moral claim to the extent of offering a fifteen years' occupancy of the houses in exchange for full possession at the end of that time. As this was the suggestion of compromise made by the deputation sent out from America last year and, at the time of their visit, rejected by the trustees, this side of the question may be regarded as in the way of settlement. If not a recognition in terms of the equitable right of the mission, it is so in fact, and the issue of character is too serious to admit of quibbling over words.

In regard to the responsibility for the Christian character of the Doshisha the trustees have also paved the way for a change which will leave them with complete control and sole responsibility, while the American Board will be free to conduct its work in its own way. By asking the Board to withdraw its subsidy and its teachers, an amicable, if sorrowful, parting is made possible. The Board, which would have hesitated to propose withdrawal, will, no doubt, take the trustees at their word and terminate a relation which involves responsibility without a voice in the control, hoping and believing that with full responsibility and a faculty wholly Japanese conservatism will grow. The Christian foundation which Mr. Neesima had so much at heart will probably be safer as the rising tide of Japanese Christian opinion produces its full effect unhindered by any further suspicion of foreign dictation or interference. No one in America, and least of all the constituency of the American Board, wishes anything but good to Japan, and especially to the school which Joseph Hardy Neesima founded in its ancient capital to the honor of Christ.

BRITISH SENTIMENT TOWARD THE UNITED STATES.

The war scare over the Venezuelan matter is almost forgotten in our country. But it has left in England a more abiding impression. The feeling among the intelligent classes of the English people toward the United States has greatly changed during the last twenty years. They do not now look askance at Americans as boastful rivals nor regard them with superior indifference. Their genuine interest in our affairs, nay, more, their warm regard for us as facing like dangers and opportunities with themselves, cannot be mistaken. This sentiment, which extensively prevails throughout England, is above national pride or prejudice and claims fraternity with those who share their traditions, their religious faith and their highest aims.

The visit of The Congregationalist's pilgrims to England has called forth a remarkable expression of this sentiment, which greatly surprised them and their friends. From the time of their arrival at Plymouth, and during their journey through the west countries, and again through the east of England, till their departure from Harwich for Holland, they were met by public demonstrations of friendship of the greatest sincerity and heartiness. They were greeted by deputations of citizens at each place on their arrival. They were presented with elegantly engrossed addresses from councils of free churches. Mayors and other officials, with large assemblies of leading citizens, entertained them in guild halls and other public buildings. Bishops, deans, canons and other clergy of the Established Church invited them to their residences. Masters and professors of colleges at Oxford and Cambridge entertained them with accounts of the histories and the peculiarities of these institutions of learning. Special services were held for them in cathedrals, and the choicest and most ancient treasures of the churches were shown to them by those best able to tell their history and to gratify the curiosity of the visitors. Everywhere they were made honored guests because they were American citizens. The thoughtful and often lavish preparations of Congregationalists in the towns and cities, and the enthusiastic reception in the Memorial Hall in London, expressed the brotherly feeling of Congregationalists for those of their own denomination, and were of themselves most gratifying evidence of a fraternal regard which holds together much more closely than formerly these two bodies of the same name.

But beyond these courtesies the attention of civic authorities and of dignitaries of the Established Church, supported by popular expressions of welcome, gave to these demonstrations a national significance. The secular and religious press, with hardly an exception, was not less friendly, and the Pilgrim Fathers have been discussed in England with a degree of attention and appreciation which has not before been accorded to them since they left their native land to worship God in the way they believed to be right. It was noticeable, also, that the discussions of their character and aims in the newspapers of the country were more discriminating and able than would be expected from papers of the same grade in our own land.

To cultivate the sentiment which is now so remarkably aroused must do much to promote the ends for which all Christians pray and labor. It is almost certain to bring about a better understanding between the Established Church and the Free churches of England. The attentions shown by bishops and other clergy toward the American guests evidenced a friendly feeling, which often found expression toward the English Nonconformists with whom the American Congregationalists were most closely affiliated, and this feeling was responded to in the same spirit. It was often remarked that the Americans were accorded privileges not yet given to English Nonconformists, and sometimes not even to Churchmen, but such attentions would not have been possible had it not been for a recognition, on either side, of an essential unity above differences of church order and government.

This sentiment in England toward the United States affords an excellent opportunity for denominational bodies in both countries to unite more closely for practical ends. Especially is it the time for English and American Congregationalists to come into closer practical fellowship. They are agreed on subjects of great importance to both nations. Their united utterance on these subjects would have great influence in shaping public opinion in America and in England. For example, there would probably be no dissenting voice among them concerning the wisdom of a permanent court of arbitration to settle all questions between the two countries which might require such a settlement. Other subjects of vital importance to the welfare of both nations are constantly arising which are proper themes of discussion in religious bodies. Why may they not be considered in the great national meetings of Congregationalists on both sides of the water, with appointed speakers in each meeting representing both countries? The consideration of such topics, followed by deliverances concerning them generally agreed on, would strengthen public opinion in favor of righteousness, would exalt Christian ideals, would promote the interests of humanity and would bring about the united emphasis of Christians in the two foremost nations of the world in behalf of all real advance toward the perfection of the kingdom of God. The purpose of The Congregationalist in organizing this pilgrimage has been thus far more than realized in its immediate results, and the paper will work to secure this end.

If it were necessary to cite additional proof that the time is surely at hand when England and the United States may co-operate more effectively in prometing the moral and spiritual interests of both nations, and by so doing in advancing the cause of righteousness throughout the world, it could be found in the remarkable reception given to Boston's military organization, the Ancient and Honorable Artillery, last week, by Queen Victoria, the Prince of Wales and the highest civil and military officials of the realm. Such courtesies and fraternal demonstrations mean but one thing—a desire for Anglo-American amity and unity. Any proposition looking to that end deserves careful consideration by those who have the interests of mankind at heart and who believe in the power of Protestant Christianity. To bring these fraternal sympathies, which have lately been so widely kindled, into practical and permanent service, to promote peace and love and Christlike character among all nations, is to lay hold of the greatest opportunity which this closing century has afforded.

CHESTNUT BLOSSOM TIME.

Midsummer comes to its hight with a whole new re-enforcement of beauty to reenforce the depleted ranks of June. The roadsides are gay with St. John's-wort and succory—immigrants both, but as much at home as the English sparrows which dust themselves in crowds in the hollows of the road—and above them towers the milkweed with its balls of blossom, which no sooner ripen than they decline, as if to make the bees' task harder as he searches the depths of the corolla, whose exquisite proportions and warm but delicate coloring are among the unregarded miracles of God's handiwork.

It is a time when against the full green of the world beauty is wrought for us in white and gold. One may walk far by road or woodland path and see little else, except for the milkweed and succory and belated clover, or the delicate pink of the wild roses which are not yet weary of their tribute to the world's summer loveliness. The elder betrays itself by fragrance before we see its round tables held aloft to tempt the midsummer fairies in their flight, and the catalpa is glorious in white and green. In the wet hollows the loose spires of the meadow rue still lift themselves above lush weeds and rank grasses, and the daisies have not yet wholly given up the field. The meadowsweet is just in its filmy perfection. Yarrow and mayweed and erigeron whiten the dusty roadside. The waste fields and corners are thick with miniature forests of melilot, and along wood paths we find the sand blackberry vines, the pyrola and the princes pine.

In spite of this abundance of white the heart of midsummer is most intent upon her golden hues. The gravelly oak woods are full of false indigo with its loose spikes of bloom. Further East the woad-waxen is yet a deeper color and makes the hillsides fairly blaze with gold. Thin fields of grain are bright with charlock, and the goldfinch, hurrying over with his dipping flight, seems to reflect its hue. Toad-flax (which the children call butter and eggs), St. John's-wort and mullein fill the roadside spaces, the coneflower asserts itself in showy clumps in the fields, in the wood glades are yellow gerardia just coming into bloom and rattlesnake weed beginning to grow weary; the hop clover spreads itself on dry banks and the buff and orange lilies hang their heads not far from the meadow rue. It is a time of flowers that grow in wands and spires, lengthening as they grow, and these are nearly all in their first perfection of form as well as beauty, so that even the agrimony wands have not yet changed their earliest golden disks to clinging burs.

The crowning glory of the midsummer time, however, whether one walks or drives, travels by rail or bestrides a wheel, is in the masses of the chestnut blossoms, which transform the forests. Again, as in the opening spring, there is at least a threefold color on every wooded hill. Then it was red of maple blossom and unfolding leaf, young green of opening spray and darker green of pine and hemlock. Now the evergreens have hardly ripened their new needles into their final depth of color, and the full summer verdure makes the contrast less, but the chestnuts extend the scale at the other end with their abundant filaments, whose yellow-white blends and contrasts with the green background of the leaves.

Nothing suggests the midsummer profusion more perfectly than this wealth of chestnut blooms. The energy that waited through the months of cold, and seemed to come to full self-consciousness in the swift growth of May, bursts with the chestnuts into the beauty of a picture which seems like a song of triumph set down in mighty words of white and green. Even the pungent alkaline odor which fills our nostrils seems to speak of strength. We know what transmutations have been going on, but now we seem to see them written large on hill and valley. The glory of earth's strength and increase is before our eyes, and we think with mingled humility and exultation that of all this power and beauty God has made man king. Summer at its hight declares man's opportunity and calls him to attainment, as the returning winter tells him of God's patience and bids him wait the sure fulfillment of his purpose.

THE SPIRIT OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE.

"What matters the spirit in which work be done, if only it be done?" so say some now and then. But watch them a little while in their relations with others. When they are become employers or superintendents, instead of underworkers, they feel and speak differently. The spirit makes a great difference, especially in certain sorts of service. It is peculiarly a vital element of Christian service. God cares much more for the spirit than for the form of our work for him, and in a large measure the work itself is given us to be done in order to afford opportunity for the cultivation of a right spirit.

Christian service therefore should be hearty, patient, indefatigable, cheerful, loving. How it absorbed the thoughts, the strength and the time of our Lord! In his work as a carpenter he showed men that true loyalty to God and one's fellow-beings is not inconsistent with earthly employments. But we cannot conceive of him as ever saying that the spirit does not matter so long as the work is done.

It is the peculiarity of Christian service that it includes the whole of our lives in its claim. We are to be God's servants not only in work but in recreation and rest, in study and meditation, at home and abroad, every moment of every hour of every day. And the spirit of our service is not merely that of our periods of labor but that which pervades and gives character to our whole lives.

It depends largely on the view which we take of our relation to God. If we regard ourselves as forced to serve him in order to escape penalty, we shall render grudging service and as little of it as possible. But if we dwell much in thought upon what he has done for us, if with humility, penitence, faith and prayer we regard him as our truest, tenderest friend, who has given his own Son for our redemptien and guides us day by day, if we are willing to be guided, by his Holy Spirit, our service will be spontaneous, sincere and earnest, as it ought to be.

CURRENT HISTORY.

The Democratic National Convention.

When, after five days of maneuvering, debate and balloting the 900 delegates left Chicago last Saturday, a new era in the history of the Democratic party and of the nation began. Elsewhere we have tried to set forth dispassionately the import of the deeds done and the platform formulated at Chicago. Space does not permit us here to give, even in broad outlines, anything like an adequate description of the exciting and at times dramatic scenes of the convention. It cared naught for precedent. Tried leaders, representing sections of the country and commonwealths that hitherto have been deferred to, were treated with contempt. The Democratic Administration not only was condemned in the platform, which takes issue with the two acts of President Cleveland that hitherto have commended him to all men irrespective of party, but the convention also squarely refused to indorse the Administration, and friends of Mr. Cleveland present in the convention, men like Senators Gray of Delaware and Vilas of Wisconsin and Comptroller Eckels of Illinois, were treated with contumely. No Eastern man, not even Senator Hill of New York with his utterances in favor of silver and his unquestioned record as a partisan—pure and simple—was trusted by the majority, made up of Southern and Western delegates, hence Senator Hill, although indorsed by the national committee for the position of temporary chairman, was defeated by Senator Daniel of Virginia. The committee on credentials ousted the gold delegations from Nebraska and Michigan and the convention indorsed the work of the committee, in the case of Michigan negativing and defying the action of the Democratic State committee. The delegates, in the selection of a presidential candidate, paid homage to an orator and a winning personality, but in so doing upset the plans of those who had intended to control the convention. As soon as the platform was formulated the representatives of New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, Rhode Island and Wisconsin in the main ceased to participate in the voting, deeming it best not to bolt but refusing to accept any responsibility for the platform or the candidates. The dominant, masterful men of the convention were leaders from the South like Tillman of South Carolina and Jones of Arkansas and men from the Interior like Altgeld of Illinois. Bragg of Wisconsin, Vilas of Michigan, Whitney and Hill of New York, Gray of Delaware and the Russells of Massachusetts had no more influence or success in shaping results than if they had not been present.

The Platform.

After a long and strenuous debate, in which Senator Tillman of South Carolina and ex-Congressman Bryan of Nebraska defended the report of the majority of the committee on resolutions, and Senators Hill of New York and Vilas of Wisconsin and ex-Governor William E. Russell of Massachusetts pleaded for the minority report, trenchantly exposing the fallacies of the proposed platform and solemnly warning the convention as to its certain divisive effect, the delegates, to some extent led captive by the brilliant and specious speech of Mr. Bryan, which subsequently made him the candidate for president, indorsed, by a vote of 628 to 301, the work of the majority of the committee and adopted a platform, of which the following is a brief analysis.

The party is pledged to antagonize the A. P. A.; to assist in preventing the importation of "foreign pauper labor"; to secure a national arbitration tribunal for the settlement of all labor disputes; to labor for the admission of the territories of New Mexico, Oklahoma and Arizona; to the maintenance of the Monroe Doctrine; to a belief in the ineligibility of any man for a third term as President. These are some of the minor, though not insignificant, declarations.

The radical and revolutionary planks of the platform, which, together with the character of the candidates, have caused a formidable and unprecedented revolt within the Democratic ranks, are those which demand the free and unlimited coinage of both silver and gold at a ratio of sixteen to one without waiting for the aid or consent of any other nation; that the standard silver dollar shall be made full legal tender equally with gold for all debts, public and private; that it shall be illegal for citizens by private contract to discriminate against silver; that hereafter all obligations of the United States must be redeemed in silver coin as well as gold; that the issue of interest bearing bonds in time of peace is to be condemned and forbidden, no matter what the peril of the national credit; that the national banking system be abolished; and those in which the integrity of the Federal Supreme Court is impugned for its decision relative to the income tax law, and the threat made of depriving the judges of their life tenure and reconstructing the court by making it a part of the political machine it may no longer stand in the way of a re-enactment by Congress of the income tax law. The interference by the Federal authority at such crises as the labor outbreak led by Mr. Debs in 1894 is denounced as "arbitrary interference, a violation of the Constitution of the United States and a crime against free institutions"; and as if these were not enough, a demand is filed for the abolition of life tenure in the public service and a return to the old spoils system.

The minority report, rejected by the convention, was signed by the representatives on the committee on resolutions of all the New England States, New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Pennsylvania Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota and South Dakota. It insisted upon the maintenance of the gold standard as essential to the "preservation of the national credit, the redemption of public pledges and the keeping inviolate of the country's honor"; it held that all paper currency should be kept at parity with gold, and it called for recognition of the honesty, economy, courage and fidelity of Mr. Cleveland's administration. But it was rejected by the overwhelming vote noted above and, moreover, on a straight test vote taken on a resolution introduced by Senator Hill of New York calling for the indorsement of the Administration, the delegates spurned Mr. Cleveland by a vote of 354 in favor of Mr. Hill's motion to 568 against it. In view of which unprecedented treatment of a party leader, it is not surprising to learn that Mr. Cleveland and most of his cabinet will decline to vote for Mr. Bryan.

The Candidates.

In the Republican convention of 1880 Mr. Garfield of Ohio, in nominating Hon. John Sherman, made a speech which so impressed the delegates with his ability and qualities as a leader that when the time came for terminating the long struggle between the friends of Messrs. Grant and Blaine, by selecting a "dark horse," the anti-Grant forces turned toward and united on Mr. Garfield, and on the thirty-sixth ballot he received the nomination. So at Chicago last week, although the parallel cannot be too closely pressed, a "dark horse" captured the nomination of president, chiefly because of the impression made by him on the delegates in the captivating and intense, if not profound, speech with which he closed the impressive debate on the question of adopting the majority or minority report of the committee on resolutions. Hon. William J. Bryan of Nebraska, the candidate for president, who was nominated on the fifth ballot, defeating Messrs. Bland of Missouri, Boies of Iowa, Matthews of Indiana and Blackburn of Kentucky, was born in Illinois so recently that he just comes within the limit of the age prescribed by the Constitution. Of Irish stock, long resident in this country, he is as loyal and devout a Presbyterian as Mr. McKinley is a Methodist, and his personal habits and his fidelity to the highest domestic ideals are such as to make it impossible for this campaign to be fought on lines other than a difference of opinion respecting ethical and economic principles. Mr. Bryan was educated at Illinois College—the creation of pioneer Congregationalists. He studied law in the office of Lyman Trumbull and began his political career as a private in the Democratic party because of its opposition to a protective tariff, and it was as an advocate of free trade that he entered Congress in 1890 on the tidal wave of reaction against the McKinley Bill, which reaction enabled him to carry a Nebraska district nominally strongly Republican. In Congress he made his mark as a strenuous opponent of protection, as an able advocate of the free coinage of silver and one of the most enthusiastic supporters of the income tax. In debate he proved himself able to fence with veteran opponents and an orator of unusual power. His eloquence, his candor and sincerity and his clean and winning personality will make him a formidable antagonist, one who on the hustings will prove to be a vote winner. His youthfulness, his inexperience in public affairs and his entire sympathy with the platform on which he stands are elements of weakness viewed from a conservative standpoint, but at the same time they will appeal to the radicals who accept the platform and are longing for a "man of destiny," which Mr. Bryan believes himself to be.

The candidate for vice-president, Mr. Arthur Sewall, a wealthy ship owner and millionaire of Bath, Me., ex-president of several railroads and now a director of railway corporations and the president of a national bank, was accepted by the delegates and elected on the fifth ballot, notwithstanding he is a protectionist, a bank director, etc., because he is one of the few Eastern men of affairs and property who has advocated the free coinage of silver at a ratio of sixteen to one. He is a capable business man whose wealth will be acceptable to the managers of the campaign, but his nomination was not indorsed by the united Maine delegation at Chicago, nor is it by the rank and file of the Maine Democracy, and since there is no probability that his nomination will cause Maine's electoral vote to be given to himself and Mr. Bryan, it is felt by observers in all sections of the country and of all parties that his nomination weakens, rather than strengthens, the ticket and adds one more anomalous feature to the already sufficiently peculiar situation.

The Outlook.

As soon as the majority report of the committee on resolutions was made public and it was seen that there was no chance for any substantial change in the platform, a bolt of disgusted Democratic journals and voters began, which, since the adoption of the platform and the selection of the candidates, has attained proportions unprecedented in our recent political history. Not only have representative independent journals like Harper's Weekly, The Springfield Republican, The Boston Herald, The Providence Journal, The New York Evening Post, The New York Times and The Philadelphia Ledger, and distinguished citizens like Prof. Charles Eliot Norton, Edward Atkinson, Carl Schurz and other men of like caliber and independent political action denounced the platform and the candidates, but there is scarcely an influential Democratic newspaper in the North, East and Interior but has done likewise, and one of the first duties and heaviest burdens that the newly-created and organized national Democratic committee, of which Senator Jones of Arkansas will be chairman, will have to perform and bear will be the creation and maintenance of newspapers which will support the candidates named at Chicago. Nor is this all. Such influential papers in the South as the Baltimore Sun and the News, the Richmond Times, the Charleston News, the Louisville Courier Journal, and the Post, and the Galveston News are leading the revolt of Southern merchants and manufacturers, while the German press of the country is practically unanimous in favor of the gold standard and in support of the party which is pledged to support it. Within a week or two it will be determined whether the revolting Democrats will support Mr. McKinley either directly by voting for him or indirectly by refusing to vote for his opponent, or whether they will call another convention, formulate a platform in harmony with their convictions respecting gold as a monetary standard and a tariff for revenue only, and name candidates who favor such views. Just now there is considerable difference of opinion among those who are repudiating Mr. Bryan and the platform as to the best way of accomplishing their purpose to secure his defeat and insure a sound money majority in the next House of Representatives. Some favor unqualified support of the Republican national ticket and others favor the nomination of a third ticket. Fortunately all seem to agree in holding that the decision must be one based on principle as well as expediency, and that it is vastly more important that the right man and men shall be elected than it is that party machinery should be kept intact.

The American Bimetallic Union, which more than any other one agency is responsible for the growth of the free silver movement in the South and West and its triumph at Chicago, has indorsed Mr. Bryan and it is thought that the Populists at their national convention, July 21, also will. Whether the Republican leaders who bolted the St. Louis convention will accept so radical a free trader as Mr. Bryan and such a platform as he stands on remains to be seen. If they do, then there will be as clean-cut an issue and as square an alignment of forces as can be imagined. Whether indorsement by the Populist convention would strengthen Mr. Bryan's hold on the suffrages of the rank and file of the Democratic party is an open question. As yet there is no evidence of any such bolt from the Republican party by friends of silver in the West and Interior as the Democratic party already has suffered. The outspoken declaration of Mr. Hobart last week revealed that he had no hesitancy in committing himself to the gold standard, and Mr. McKinley's latest utterance indicates that he realizes the gravity of the situation and the real issue of the campaign. The fact that the South Dakota Republican State convention last week indorsed the national platform and read Senator Pettigrew, the St. Louis bolter, out of the party shows that the party has a fighting chance when it stands up straight and fights.

NOTES.

Yale's defeat at Henley is not surprising or disgraceful. They met veteran, seasoned oarsmen, made a plucky fight and took their defeat like genuine sportsmen.

The Boston Standard, the daily organ of the American Protective Association in New England, died from inanition July 11. It lived longer than we expected it would.

The Indian Government must defray the expense of the use of Indian troops in the Soudan British campaign. The passage to the House of Lords of the bill legalizing in Great Britain marriage with a deceased wife's sister is a staggering blow for the Anglican and Roman clergy.

Lord Aberdeen of Canada practically had to eject Sir Charles Tupper from the post of premier. The latter tried to find soft berths for his Tory retainers before quitting power, and Lord Aberdeen refused to be party to any such scheme of depriving the Liberals of the fruit of their victory.

The rapprochement between Great Britain and Italy is growing, and Lord Salisbury's contemplated sojourn in Italy and personal intercourse with Italian statesmen is expected to bring forth fruit. The Rudini ministry has collapsed on the issue of lessening national expenditures for the army.

IN BRIEF.

How about those ways of serving others which the changed conditions of a summer environment bring? To see and embrace them speedily may save regret when the swiftly passing season for them is over.

Rev. W. G. Puddefoot, constant traveler and keen observer that he is, feels the pulse of this nation in all its heterogeneous parts as few men do. We shall print next week a timely and suggestive article by him on some of the causes of the present political unrest.

The death on Monday of George P. Smith, for fifty years identified with the C. S. S. and P. S. and its agent since 1877, brings surprise and sorrow to many besides the Congregational House circle that held him so dear. We shall print next week a sketch of his long and useful life.

Rev. Dr. Edward Everett Hale is not so busy but that he can put one more iron in the fire—and keep it hot; hence The Christian Register is able to announce that hereafter he will contribute regularly to a new department of that paper, The Good News department. This is good news.

Eliot, the apostle to the Indians, is buried at Roxbury. It is his monument, and not his grave, which is at South Natick. An editorial stated the contrary a week ago and has brought us abundant evidence of the kind and critical regard in which the accuracy of statement in our columns is held.

These times of political excitement and upheaval make strenuous demands upon those who aspire to office. But the plain everyday citizen has sobering responsibilities too. The level head, the single eye, the pure heart—these are needed today as never before throughout the rank and file of American citizens.

Humanitarians who depreciate the church will do well to note that the inspiration of Uncle Tom's Cabin—a book which has, perhaps, done more than any other except the Bible to further recognition of the brotherhood of man—came to its author at the communion table. The touching story is told on another page of this issue.

Not the least of the incidental beneficial results of The Congregationalist's Pilgrimage will be a clearer setting forth of the opportunities accessible to the ordinary traveler who would be disposed to visit historic shrines associated with the Pilgrims if he knew just where and how to find them. Desirable as special escort to these places is, it is by no means essential.

When multitudes have exiled themselves in early times, have founded Western settlements and resulting cities near to their mines, have endured exposure, faced dangers and toiled for two generations to open and develop silver mines, they should not be expected to smile indifferently when legislation determines that their products are worth only from forty to fifty cents an ounce.—Northwestern Christian Advocate.

God's lavish provision of silver and modern applied science, and not legislation, have determined the market value of silver.

No secretary is more generally welcome in the churches of this State than Barna S. Snow of the Boston Seaman's Friend Society, and his large circle of friends will rejoice to hear that he is recovering from the illness that has kept him from his desk in the Congregational House for over two months, and which at times has been serious and even alarming. He is now at Ashby, Mass., reaping benefit from country air and surroundings. We trust he will soon be able to resume his cherished work.

A well-known minister in an adjoining State—a fine preacher, too, as well as a doctor of divinity—recently related to his association this bit of personal experience. One of his most intelligent hearers told him one Sunday evening that she did not like to have him exchange. He waited for the expected compliment. She went on to say that she worked hard with her brain in school all the week and when Sunday came she wanted a chance to rest it! The conversation ceased at that point, leaving the doctor a wiser and a humbler man.

The clerical figures in her [Mrs. Stowe's] books were, however, usually Congregationalists or Presbyterians. They sometimes fatigue you, but in this respect also they have verisimilitude.—The Nation. This is what might be called A Certain Condescension in Unitarians or Episcopalians. We hope also that some surviving member of the Beecher family will think it worth while to speak his mind about the amazing and amusing tone of patronage assumed over his own signature by a contributor to The Critic in his review of the life of Mrs. Stowe.

Mr. Gladstone is being driven into a corner. The logical bearing and drift of his toying with the papacy is being demonstrated to him and the British Protestant public. "Would you," wrote the Rev. Mr. Wynn, a Baptist minister, to Mr. Gladstone, "if your heart's desire was fulfilled, see the whole of Christendom under the sway of the pope? If not, why ask papal sanction for the validity of the Anglican orders or any form of ministry?" Mr. Gladstone replied: "The Church of Rome recognizes as valid a baptism when regularly performed by other Christian communions. For baptism read orders. Papal sanction would strengthen Christianity." The cable reports that the Nonconformists think the answer evasive, and justly.

The news of Miss A. B. Child's return this week to Boston and to her desk in the Congregational House will be joyfully hailed by her many friends. Since she left this city last October, she has been visiting mission stations of the Woman's Board in India, Ceylon, China, going last to Japan, where she remained a month, sailing from Yokohama for Vancouver. Although somewhat wearied by the long, hot journey across the continent, she is in good health and looks the better for the change. Miss Child speaks enthusiastically of her trip, which was not only without an accident but "was not even marked by an adventure," she said laughingly, modestly refraining from the mention of half the honors showered upon her by the missionaries and their friends. Life and Light will be more attractive and valuable than ever now that its editor has seen so much of the mission work with her own eyes.

Much depends on the point of view. Thus we find the Christian Observer of Louisville, the representative journal of the Presbyterian Church South, attributing to Mrs. Stowe greater influence than any other person in causing the Civil War, because of the influence which her book, Uncle Tom's Cabin, had. This is certainly a compliment in view of what the war determined once for all, but the Southern editor proceeds to add: "Her thought was simply the money she would make by it, coupled with a desire to give expression to the prejudices which she felt towards the Southern people." We have italicized a phrase which is indicative, we suppose, of that chivalry and admiration for woman so frequently the boast of Southerners, and Kentuckians especially. We regret to hear such an echo of the old cry that Northerners were "Mudsills" and worshipers of lucre, that they were too base to fight for principle or anything that conflicted with the interests of their pockets.

Pilgrimage Letters.

The Glories of Oxford and Cambridge.

MANSFIELD COLLEGE, OXFORD.

It is nothing uncommon for Americans to visit the two ancient seats of learning which are among the greatest glories of Great Britain, to view their gray, weather-stained edifices wrought with quaint, Gothic ornament, to wander through their cloistered walks and over their grassy quadrangles, but it is most extraordinary when the fellows and masters of these institutions proffer their services as guides and give hours of their valuable time to the entertainment of strangers from the new world. Both at Oxford and Cambridge, however, this unusual privilege was enjoyed by The Congregationalist's Pilgrimage party, and the academic cap and gown of our distinguished cicerone everywhere proved an open sesame to places not usually open to tourists. At Oxford we were thus conducted by Professor Hall, whose affable manners and ripe scholarship made the hours spent in his society a pleasure never to be forgotten.

A striking external feature in all English colleges is the box of flowering plants placed outside the windows, making a lovely mass of bloom against the background of dingy stone walls. The founder of this pretty fashion of window gardening, John Kyrle, is honored with a portrait in Balliol, in the same room with Wyckliffe, Browning, Tait, Manning and a host of other eminent men. The Sheldonian Theater is where the degrees are conferred, and as we passed the grotesque stone busts on pedestals outside we recalled the racy letter that Phillips Brooks once wrote to his little niece describing the ceremony when the honor was bestowed upon him. Lowell, Holmes, and this season Ambassador Bayard, are other Americans who have been similarly honored. Another feature, different from anything we have at home, is the number of college chapels, often structures of great architectural beauty, with richly decorated windows and full of history and legend. For our party, however, the crowning event at Oxford was the luncheon at Mansfield College. It is a great victory for Nonconformity that its theological school now has a home in this scholar's paradise, and that a man like Dr. Fairbairn, whose attainments and character have won universal respect, is the principal. The series of Puritan portraits in the dining hall furnished him a text for a fine postprandial speech, in which he uttered this noble sentiment: "Nothing implies such a lack of faith as persecution and nothing shows so large a faith as liberty."

Again in Cambridge, through the kind intervention of A. W. W. Dale, we enjoyed the exceptional advantage of having either a master or fellow to do the honors, Drs. Peele and Morgan serving us in the morning and Dr. Butler, master of Trinity, in the afternoon. An agreeable pause in the sight-seeing was afforded by a superb organ recital in one of the chapels by a nephew of Prof. R. G. Moulton of university extension fame. As Trinity holds a unique place in the group of seventeen colleges, being the largest and the one which entertains royalty when visiting Cambridge, a somewhat detailed account of our visit there may be of interest.

The office of master, corresponding to that of college president in America, is filled at present by a man of most charming personality, who possesses the rare gift of making persons and events of the past throb with the life of today. Under the magic touch of his choice diction the old portraits on the walls seemed to step out of their frames and join our procession through rooms where the feet of kings, judges, bishops and teachers had trod before us. There is a bit of romance, too, in Dr. Butler's second marriage to which we could not be insensible, especially when he wove into his fascinating web of talk anecdotes of "little Jim," his son of six, whose toy trumpet we noticed lying carelessly upon a table in one of the stately apartments in close proximity to objects of priceless value. When considerably beyond middle life Dr. Butler married Miss Ramsey, the Girton graduate of twenty, who carried off the prizes in Greek a few years ago, and the music of three little children's voices now resounds through the oaken-paneled rooms of old Trinity. Not long ago, when Ambassador Bayard was a guest in the home, little Jim inquired: "Papa, what is an ambassador?" To which his father gave the wise reply: "An ambassador, my son, is a kind, good man who tries to make all good men friends with each other." Whereupon the child solemnly inquired: "Is he black?"

No words can describe the impressions which crowded upon us as we sat in the large, nobly proportioned drawing-room, Dr. Park occupying the queen's chair, and listened to our genial host's account of bygone scenes which had transpired there. Looking through the diamond-shaped panes of the great bow window, across a little bit of a court, we saw where four typical men, Newton, Macaulay, Thackeray and Lightfoot, once had their quarters. On the walls of this same grand apartment was a portrait of Elizabeth in the stiffest of brocades and the widest of ruffs, and another of Henry VIII., whom a student at one of the women's colleges wittily characterized as "the greatest widower of his age." This last painting was by a pupil of Holbein, and on grand occasions a reflector lamp is placed in front to show off the fine coloring. Here, too, was a portrait of the great Newton at nearly seventy, and bearing a striking resemblance to the late Dean Stanley, also several of eminent masters and chancellors of the university, the latter always being a person of royal blood or a nobleman of high rank. The present incumbent is the Duke of Devonshire. Into this room Elizabeth once came with Lord Burleigh, and every sovereign since Anne's time has graced the apartment. Victoria came in state in 1847, when the prince consort was made chancellor, and again in her jubilee year. We were shown the state bedrooms, in which the appointments were far less elegant than in many an American home, but O, what a wealth of portraits on the wall! A tender interest invested the picture of the Duke of Clarence, who occupied the room the night before receiving his LL. D. Shortly afterwards he died and his father, the Prince of Wales, who took his M. A. at Cambridge, presented the son's portrait to Trinity.

Other interesting rooms were those assigned to the judges when they come up to the assizes and practically take possession of the establishment. Dr. Butler facetiously remarked that the whole British constitution would probably come to an end if he, in his own house, should presume to act as host on these august occasions! They have a special kitchen and scullery set apart for their use lest, as our host jokingly suggested, they be poisoned with ordinary food. Here, likewise, were faces of men who seemed like old friends when introduced in Dr. Butler's inimitable fashion. One of Lord Lyndhurst, son of the American painter Copley, had a sad, sweet expression and one of Justice Patteson, father of Coleridge Patteson of missionary fame, was singularly attractive, one hand being placed behind his ear in the attitude of listening. An autograph letter accompanies the picture, in which the father speaks pathetically of "dear Coley" taking orders and going to far-off Melenasia, and the possibility of their never meeting again, a prediction only too soon verified. We saw a beautiful carved pulpit to the son's memory in Exeter Cathedral.

Among the more vivid recollections which we shall retain of that enriching half day is the picture of Tennyson in his scarlet gown, the graceful, almost feminine head of Arthur Hallam, faces of illustrious statesmen of today—Balfour, Harcourt and Speaker Gully—Bishop Wordsworth, a brother of the poet, in scarlet gown and white tippet, Whewell and Barrow, each of whom had an amazing range of knowledge, Westcott and Lightfoot placed side by side on the great oaken stairway, and the tall old clock on the stairs bequeathed by Sir Isaac Newton to Bentley, one of the most popular masters of Trinity. Then the walk in the lovely garden, where is reputed to be the finest bit of green in all England, a great emerald parallelogram which, in the language of tradition, "we rolls and we mows for a thousand years," and which Wordsworth's room overlooked—where is the artist in words to depict the witchery of the scene? In another garden we saw the lofty, spreading tree that nobody could name until Asa Gray came as a guest to Trinity and classified it as an ailanthus; and in the library the noble bust of Byron holding a copy of Childe Harold in the left hand, together with the original draft of Milton's Paradise Lost and a bewildering array of other treasures, literary and scientific, that would require weeks to see satisfactorily.

From beginning to end the stay of the American pilgrims at Cambridge was a continual feast. Our arrival was toward the close of a perfect June day and we were driven at once to Edenfield, the beautiful home of Mr. and Mrs. Munsey, who had invited a large number of guests to meet us at a garden party. There were no formal speeches, but words of welcome from Rev. P. T. Forsyth, D. D., Mr. Dale and others, and opportunity for social converse under the green trees, where the fragrance of exquisite roses was mingled with the aroma of tea and strawberries. Several of the same kind friends came to the station on our departure, and once more we fared forth laden with a deep sense of the blessedness of that Christian fellowship which has illumined all our way.

DOSHISHA UNIVERSITY AND THE AMERICAN BOARD.

BY REV. J. H. PETTEE.

The Japanese trustees of the Doshisha have taken the following action, and communicated it to both the mission and the Board:

1. That we express our deep feeling of gratitude to the American Board for its generous support in sending us ever since the founding of the school many missionary teachers and large grants in aid.
2. That in order to make clear our relation to the American Board we decline to receive, after the close of 1896, its customary gift of an annual subsidy and its aid of missionary teachers. However, this shall be carried into effect after consultation with the Board.
3. That we make it our object to be clearly understoood that we issue our appeal to people of all nations for their sympathy and help toward maintaining and enlarging our work.

This was under date of May 6. On May 20 the following supplementary action was reported to the mission:

Resolved, That in order to show our deep gratitude to the American Board, we offer to the missionaries of that Board the free use of the nine houses in Kyoto for a period of fifteen years, according to the regulations of our corporation, and also give to them the same privilege of use of the library as is given to members of the Doshisha faculty.

In a later note of explanation the proviso is included that the houses in question be not needed for other foreign teachers of the school, and it is stated that the trustees will pay all taxes, but those who occupy the houses will be responsible for keeping them in repair.

President Kozaki also asserts that the trustees by this series of votes have no intention of turning out the present foreign teachers, "who have labored so long and devotedly," nor do "we desire that your connection with the school should cease," but rather "that you may all remain and aid us in the good work of Christian education. What the trustees have intended is simply to remove all the past misunderstandings. . . . We wish you to know clearly where we stand and what we intend to do, and we hope that you will give all the help you can by associating yourselves with us in this great work." He also asserts strongly that the trustees intend to make the institution "thoroughly and genuinely Christian," "a center of Christian influence in Japan in the future as it has been in the past."

Detailed discussion on this whole unpleasant controversy is not called for here. Solely in the interests of furthering a speedy settlement and securing acquiescence therein, I would make the following observations.

The missionaries have two counts against the Japanese trustees. First, that the whole spirit and action of the Japanese board is the assertion of past independence and not of the intention to become independent. In all its early history the moral double headship of the school was freely acknowledged. But of recent months—yes, years—the tendency to ignore any sense of moral obligation to the Board, except that of gratitude as to a past patron, has grown more and more marked. Again and again have the mission protested, but with less and less effect. The culmination came in the question of missionary residences, where, if anywhere, the foreigners thought their moral claim to consideration could never be questioned, and in the conferences last fall with the deputation.

Even granting that the Japanese statement of the case in the matter of those residences is correct in its details, which not a single missionary would do and many Japanese deny, the fundamental fact still remains that the method of procedure adopted by our Japanese brethren ignores plain history and universally known facts. Whether they like it or not the Doshisha, up to the present time, has been a partnership arrangement. For the one holding the legal power to claim likewise the entire moral control and treat the other as a silent partner is not what we should expect of high-souled Christian brethren. And yet that has been the attitude on this property question, and also in their treatment of the deputation last year. Courteous in details, ready to answer all questions, they never once admitted by their conduct that these were other than visitors from abroad. On the main point at issue they refused to yield a single iota. They seemed determined to demonstrate one thing alone, and that was their complete moral as well as legal independence of the Board.

This is one of the things that grieves us. It is one of the two fundamental points at issue. Each side stands, not for the worth of a few houses, but for what it deems a principle. The one for independence, claiming that the highest morality is obscured if any distinction be drawn between legal and moral rights. The other, with American bluntness, contending facts are facts, history is history. Ignoring them and coolly adopting a new interpretation, which has never been consciously admitted by one of the parties interested, does not seem in accord with the highest ethics.

The other grave matter of difference has reference to the principles and conduct of the school itself. The missionaries feel, and their belief is shared by many Japanese, that the school has already considerably lowered its Christian tone, and there is no sufficient evidence of an earnest purpose to improve the situation. In almost every decision of recent months, bearing directly or indirectly on this question, the non-Christian, or extremely liberal Christian, element has carried the day. This is denied by the trustees, and there is no question as to the high personal character of the men on the board or the individual loyalty to Christian truth of a large majority of the trustees.

I do not desire to express my personal view on this matter, but simply to state what is known to every one in Japan conversant with Doshisha matters, that there are two widely diverse views both as to the present conduct of the Doshisha with reference to Christianity, and also as to the best manner of teaching Christian principles in a high grade educational institution. Such is the situation. Painful as it has become, it is well to have the issue sharply drawn. There seemed no common meeting ground.

One side or the other must yield. To close up the old relations and start anew was, humanly speaking, the only solution. Hence the sooner it is done, the better.

From the necessities of the case the old relations were hazy and undefined. The founding of the Doshisha was a work of faith. Some things could not be sharply stated. Business arrangements were out of harmony with the times. But now all is changed. New Japan can draw a deed in black and white. The missionaries have learned some things by experience.

Moreover we cannot forget the force of national sentiment and its bearing on the question. One of the keenest minds in our missionary fraternity has recently penned the following:

> If an endowed institution is planted in a country occupied by a fairly homogeneous native race the conflict is sure to come in time, whatever the method of holding the property may be. The only countries where foreign control of well-endowed institutions will be long tolerated are those occupied by diverse native races in conflict with each other.

The Doshisha has had a remarkable history. Even should it now go down it has paid many times over for the gifts and lives, the prayers and tears bestowed upon it. It has now come to the gravest crisis in its twenty years of service. Its friends assert that it will shortly clear itself from all entanglements and rise into a larger, fuller life. Its critics simply stand and wait. Time will be given its managers to demonstrate by deeds as well as promises that they know how to conduct a high grade Christian school. If they succeed all will rejoice. If they fail some other school will take up the weighty burden and bear it on nearer the shining goal.

Okayama, Japan, June 16.

HOW UNCLE TOM'S CABIN WAS WRITTEN.

BY ADELA E. THOMPSON, CLEVELAND, O.

It was a Sunday morning in 1852, and communion service was being celebrated in a little church in the small college town of Brunswick, Me. In the quiet congregation was the wife of one of the professors of Bowdoin College, a plain, fragile little woman in delicate health, burdened with a family, troubled with the pressure of limited means, busy with many cares; the last one, judging from outward circumstance, to lay her hand on the pulse of a people and stir the heart of a nation to its depths.

Around was the peaceful atmosphere of the day and scene, but even here were hearts stirred by the shadow of a haunting unrest, for already was the country entered on the era of excited feeling and exciting events which preceded and presaged the Civil War. Kansas soil was wet with the blood of the free and slave State men; the famous and infamous Dred Scott decision had been promulgated; the Fugitive Slave Law had been not only enacted but enforced even on the streets of liberty-loving Boston; and anti slavery sentiment in the North had become a flood, rising constantly higher and stronger.

No one felt that throbbing stress more keenly than this little woman, daughter of a line in whose veins the love of freedom coursed with their blood. For years she had lived on the border line between freedom and slavery, where the conflict of feeling raged most fiercely. Even her own home had felt its force. Lane Seminary, Cincinnati, to which her father and her husband had given their best labors, had been almost disrupted by dissension over the burning question, and Professor Stowe was compelled to leave in consequence.

As she sat, pale, feeble, almost unknown, before the white-draped communion table, and pressed to her lips the cup which symbolizes a common brotherhood in Christ, there came to her mind the thought of brethren of a darker hue, a remembering of those in bonds as bound with them, and with it there rose before her a picture of a gentle, simple soul, strong alike in loyalty and faith, tortured, suffering, dying, and, like the martyrs of old, looking up steadfastly into heaven in the hour of his trial and triumph, a picture that in power and pathos has never been excelled in literature —the death of "Uncle Tom."

Around this scene, as its nucleus, the book grew chapter by chapter. It grew through days when little children clamored, and household cares hindered, and the struggle with uncertain health continued—much of it written, as with her portfolio on her knee she sat by the kitchen fire, in moments snatched while the bread was baking and the dinners boiling, and with no thought of fame or gain, but simply because a voice within that would not be silenced commanded "write"; grew sadly, sorrowfully, and in anguish of spirit, the cry—and how faint and far a cry it must have seemed—of a weak woman's voice against a great and gigantic wrong.

The world knows the rest—its first appearance, with the resultant interest and excitement that kept presses thundering and translators' pens busy to supply the demand that opened to Harriet Beecher Stowe the hearts of all lovers of freedom and justice on both sides of the sea, and that proved not the least of the engines for the final overthrow of slavery.

Our compliments to The Occident, whose comment upon our utterances in regard to the duty of Congregational ministers seeking Presbyterian fellowship is treacle mixed with gall. "The lack of subscription is the weakness of Congregationalism," it says. "Its ministry is like a lot of loose heads each independent to believe or not what he may choose." This can hardly be described as the soft tongue that breaketh the bone, and its ignorance is as amazing as its English is slovenly. For the information of The Occident we would say that every Congregational pastor is ordinarily a member of the church which he serves, and always a member of some church. He not only subscribes to the creed of the church in which he is a member, but is examined and installed, or recognized, by a council of neighboring churches, which always takes cognizance of his church membership. Any other relation is irregular. Nor are Congregational church creeds always slight tests of doctrine. If The Occident wishes instances of a stiff Calvinistic creed for subscription we can still point out Congregational churches in which the pastor must subscribe to a faith almost as narrow as that of the Westminster Confession. Study up Congregationalism a bit before you hit us again, brother Occident, and then perhaps you will know where to strike.

To turn work into play is the highest achievement of active life.—H. W. Mabie.

DR. BARRETT'S OPINION OF US.

At the recent meeting of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, Rev. G. S. Barrett, D. D., the delegate of the body to our last National Council at Syracuse, gave a bright and comprehensive account of what had particularly impressed him on this side the water. Our English correspondent thus summarizes his address:

Dr. Barrett first acknowledged with sincerest gratitude the cordial way in which he was received by the brethren in America. But for one or two small indications to the contrary, such as the unclerical dress of Congregational ministers in the States, he could easily have imagined himself attending a meeting of the English Union. He was impressed by the intellectual capacity of leading Congregationalists, and more impressed by the depth and reality of their affection for the mother country and their warm and fraternal regard in particular for their ecclesiastical brethren in Britain. Referring to "that petty and miserable Venezuela question," Dr. Barrett made bold to say that if the question of peace or war between England and America were left to be decided by the Congregational churches of both countries, the result would not be doubtful for a single moment. The honor and wealth of America were only less dear to us than they are to Americans, and our prosperity and good name, our safety and happiness, lay very near the heart of all that is truest and best among the American people. "Even this year," continued Dr. Barrett, "a large company of our brethren are coming on a pilgrimage to this country, and I am sure they will receive the warmest and most hospitable welcome from us when they arrive."

Dr. Barrett considers that the meetings of the National Council compare unfavorably with the assembly of the English Union, in the time largely and necessarily taken up with the discussion of administrative questions, which we relegate to county unions. He testified to the high order of the speeches he heard, and is not sure that your men are not ahead of ours in their remarkable capacity for public speech and debate. He noted that you are confronted by the same great problems as we are, and that American and English brethren are completely in accord in the deep and intense conviction that the solution of the grave problems of modern civilization and the remedy for the sorrow and suffering, as well as for the sin, of the world are only to be found in the gospel of the incarnation and sacrifice of the Son of God. Dr. Barrett mentioned some things in which English Congregationalists may learn from their brethren in the States. "They guard the entrance to the ministry more carefully and jealously than we do (applause), and that hybrid and pernicious independence which is the curse of some of our churches is unknown among the Congregational churches of America. They reconcile the local autonomy of the individual church with the influence of the larger authority and the riper wisdom of the federated churches." We might take also, he said, a most useful lesson from the conduct of your weekly meetings for prayer, which are less formal and stereotyped than ours, and from the solemn and impressive form which you use for the admission of new church members, who make public confession of faith usually by the recitation of the Apostles' Creed. Dr. Barrett declared himself unreservedly in favor of this practice. In the service of song he thinks you are behind us, neither the fullness of volume of song nor the general musical ability being on a level with our own. Dr. Barrett mentioned that he was kindly and hospitably entertained at the house of Bishop Huntington, "a man of singular sweetness and nobleness of spirit," and concluded with the aspiration that God in his mercy might bless our brethren in the States more and more, and give to them, what we most of all desire for ourselves, an ever-filling measure of the power of the Holy Ghost.

International Christian Endeavor Convention.

The Fifteenth Annual Gathering, July 8-13, Washington, D. C.

ENDEAVORERS A "COLD WATER PARTY."

Showers, showers, showers—of rain, of welcome and of blessing. This is the copious outpouring which greeted the Endeavor visitors during their first few days of meeting. The army of badge-bedecked enthusiasts has fallen into the hands of its friends. While the invaders who had taken earliest advantage of rates and dates were not so conspicuous at first in outer Washington, their presence was being felt to an increasing degree in the homes and public buildings, where as a result of the inclement elements individuals and throngs were seeking familiar acquaintance with the city and its citizens.

ENDEAVOR WASHINGTON.

For the same reason the community did not at once hasten to adorn itself in the glory which has signalized former conventions. But with prospective sunshine doubts and fears broke away and whole sections of the residential and business locality shone out in the adopted red, white and blue flag hung side by side with the national ensign, the whole arrangement being interspersed in full complement with significent words and emblems. Should the guests judge from appearances all Washington, perhaps the whole District of Columbia, constituted itself the reception committee, so that it was evident from the beginning that the hosts had taken the hearts of the Washingtonians before they took the city.

What a gathering place the capital is for the young people is being fully realized, so that as Mr. W. H. H. Smith, chairman of the '96 committee, said, the liberality of Congress in its unanimous vote to grant certain unusual privileges and the encouragement of officials and citizens are not misplaced. Moreover, enough cannot be said of the completeness of the detailed arrangements and the system of execution, suggestions which are partially explained by the fact that at the close of two years of preparation the committee found itself twenty-four hours ahead of time on the eve of the convention. What of it then if "Williston" tent was blown down by the storm of the first night? In the face of these determined Endeavorers the powers of darkness do not win continued victories.

THE SEND-OFF.

With what more appropriate central thought could the introductory meetings have opened the first evening than with Deepening the Spiritual Life, and how better could the delegates have shown their object in coming to the white city than by the magnificent congregations of that rainy night? Twenty-two centers of the community poured forth a thrilling harmony of praise in song and speech for two hours, each pastor presiding at his own church and introducing two speakers. A period of quiet followed the addresses at the close of the preliminary session of the week, which proved helpful.

THE FORMAL START.

When the Endeavorers awoke the second day unless they had taken the precautionary measure of previous decisions they were perplexed at the fifty-page program to know how best to plan for their possible attendance at the distributed gatherings. It was a simple question at first, since the disablement of one of the great tents left open a choice of tents "Washington" or "Endeavor" in which, as in "Williston," was to be conducted a practically simultaneous and similar order of "Welcomes," annual addresses and reports. The greetings were sung, sounded, spoken and shaken, and it needed little urging of the leaders of the assembled thousands in each tent to inspire such a show and shout of response as will not be forgotten by those who stood before the sea of cheerful faces. If the sunshine was obscure without, it was full, free and continuous within. Under the towering peak of the nation's monument to its first father were gathered a throng of young Americans than whom no organization of the country can boast of more loyalty to Christian Americanism. It was the climax of the hour when President Clark and Secretary Baer came forward for their annual messages. "This is a good year to build platforms," said Dr. Clark. "If I do not state our platform correctly, I do not ask you to stand upon it." These are its chief planks:

First. Our covenant prayer meeting pledge—the magna charta of Christian Endeavor.

Second. Our consecration meeting—guaranteeing the spiritual character of the society.

Third. Our committees—giving to each active member some specific and definite work "for Christ and the church."

Fourth. Our interdenominational and international fellowship, based upon our denominational and national loyalty.

Fifth. Our individual independence and self-government, free from control of United Society, State or local union, convention or committee; all of which exist for fellowship and inspiration, not for legislation.

Sixth. Our individual subordination as societies to our own churches, of which we claim to be an integral, organic, inseparable part.

Seventh. Our Christian citizenship plank—our country for Christ, but as a society no entangling political alliances. Our missionary plank—Christ for the world.

Eighth. Our ultimate purpose—to deepen the spiritual life and raise the religious standards of young people the world over.

That 5,000,000 Endeavorers have been enrolled, of whom more than 2,700,000 are still members, is an item for reflection. That the early stand "America for Christ" has been advanced to "Christ for the world" was the development shown by the calculations of Secretary Baer. To count the "branches, twigs and leaves" of the Endeavor tree is to enroll a multitude for number, but to gather the fruit of the thrifty growth would be to touch every walk and phase of life. In figures the choicest fruitage is in additions to the churches—210,400 from the young people's societies and 21,500 from the juniors. The presentation of banners for the greatest proportional and absolute increase in the number of societies for the past twelve months found Scotland and England, respectively, in the lead, the latter for the second time.

THE SOCIETY IN THE DENOMINATIONS.

The choice of afternoon meetings was made easy also. The twenty-eight denominational rallies, held in as many different places, filled two hours with loyal enthusiasm such as the emphasis of filial bonds and review of proud histories cannot fail to arouse. In the Congregational gathering, over which Dr. W. E. Barton presided in Central Hall, one of the opening speakers, Dr. J. L. Hill, touched the answering chord of an audience of 1,500 or 2,000 young loyalists when he suggested that his hearers were attending the rally, and he extended the sympathy of those present to the gatherings in other places. Such an expression, however, seemed quite unnecessary, since other denominationalists were massed in such numbers as to be each content in itself for the time. The good deeds, principles and aspirations of the various orders were applauded to the echo, the representative speakers being drawn from the strong churches, C. E. unions and foreign bodies throughout this continent and Great Britain.

CHRISTIAN CITIZENSHIP.

What wonder that the citizenship meetings were among the most extraordinary! Held within hearing of those very spots which have rung and echoed with the oratory of our greatest statesmen, the nine gatherings in the name of Christian citizenship were most earnest. Every audience was large, numbered by hundreds, and in some instances by the thousand. The speakers were on fire with zeal for the cause, and their names were for the most part already familiar to their auditors. Hardly a meeting could have reached a higher pitch than that at which Mr. Booker T. Washington, "the foremost of a race of orators," opened to view the darkest corners of the Black Belt. He was accompanied by the Hampton octet of male singers, whose rendering of There's a Great Camp Meeting in the Promised Land, and Rise and Shine and Give God the Glory, and other plantation melodies, delighted Northerners hardly more than the Southern delegates at various times during the sessions. At the hands of Dr. H. H. Russell, Dr. P. S. Henson, Mr. T. E. Murphy, Dr. R. S. McArthur, Dr. Alexander Alison, Bishop Alexander Walters, Rev. T. W. Fifield, Rev. H. K. Carroll and an array of others prominent in public life the saloon was scored as "the devil's Gibraltar," and the corrupt politician was stripped to his uncomely skeleton.

THE JUNIORS EN MASSE.

"Ten thousand Junior Endeavorers, with a sprinkling of the elder society," was the verdict of a city pastor at the mass meeting of the youngsters. They had already had rally meetings in the big tents, but when the thousands met under one canvas their souls blended into a swelling enthusiastic company which was the admiration and pride of their older brothers and sisters.

In the allied meetings of the intermediate society and the mothers' and parents' societies, as in the discussions of floating, life savers' and travelers' societies, somewhat more unfamiliar lines of advance endeavor were considered and able speakers were drawn largely from the women workers, Mrs. F. E. Clark, Miss Hyde, Miss Haus and Miss Mason being among them. The same afternoon the two other tents were occupied with great audiences of men only and women only, and the words of Commander Booth-Tucker, Dr. Chapman and Mr. C. N. Hunt to the men and of Mrs. Booth-Tucker, Mrs. Whittemore and others to the women were awakening new determinations for service.

"SAVED TO SERVE."

This inspiring subject of a whole day led the thoughts of the multitudes into "the relations of myself to my neighbor" and to "my foreign brother." To the end that better service at home might be accomplished, live conferences of officers and committees were conducted, and for the inspiration of more zealous efforts abroad the annual custom of the unrolling of the missionary roll of honor was given a place. This exercise evolved the stimulating announcement that 8,200 societies, which were recorded on the 560 feet of paper which made up the roll, had contributed over $150,000 to home and foreign missions and $200 000 to other objects of charity. Then such topics as The Joy of Soul Winning, The School of Prayer, Some Conditions of Successful Service, Our Glorious Incentives to Serve, Every Talent for Christ and The King's Business gave the listeners an opportunity to refresh their withered resolves in the outpouring torrent of a full consecration "to save men at all costs."

"WHERE, O, WHERE."

The Friday evening program of superb addresses, at six of the most commodious churches of the city, added to drawing announcements from the three tents, illustrates the problem which every session presented to the delegates, whose perplexity was continually deepened by the thought, "It is all supremely good." For instance, a glimpse at the sumptuous feast of this session alone showed: Choice Books and Choice Character, by Dr. K. B. Tupper; Meetness for the Master's Use, by Dr. J. L. Withrow; Christian Endeavor an Evangelistic Force, by Dr. J. W. Chapman; The Call to Missionary Service, by Dr. A. J. Brown; Christian Endeavor and World for Christ, by Dr. F. J. Stanley; and more than a score of other courses as rich in helpfulness as in attractiveness

"LET US HEAR THEM."

Far from being strange then that there was a deal of scurrying around from place to place for the cream from each overflowing cup. The fact to be wondered at was, on the other hand, that until about the half-way point of the week the throng of visitors was merely seen and not heard upon the streets. But the swelling tide reached its hight at last and the voice of song was in the air in answer to the citizens' request, "Let us hear them sing."

THE GRAND "SING OUT."

The climax of the closing week and a powerful illustration of the musical abilities of Endeavor Washington—an event which had been anticipated as eagerly by the three chorus sections of over 1,000 voices each as by the convention and the city—occurred in the late afternoon at a grand patriotic open air service on the east Capitol front. For hours before the great praise service, Pennsylvania Avenue and all the thoroughfares radiating from Capitol Hill streamed with numberless thousands of persons, until the capital of the nation took on the lively appearance of inauguration day. It is not too much to estimate that, including the out-of-town delegates, nearly one-tenth of the city's population, or over 25,000, were present, gathered under the shade of the nation's chief building, before the huge chorus of 4,000 persons, banked tier above tier, in gay attire, upon the steps of the Capitol. The assistance of the United States Marine Band was an added feature of the occasion. There, under the inspiring influence of such surroundings, America and Endeavor hymns swelled up to the very heavens in the name of him whom Endeavorers love to worship. Dr. Clark and Hon. John Wanamaker added brief addresses and the hosts dispersed, jubilant with the successes of the first three days at Washington.

CONVENTION STARS AND STRIPES.

All roads led to the "white lots."

O, Christian Endeavorers, I call upon you for evangelistic endeavor for 1896-97.—Evangelist Chapman.

Let every Endeavorer mistake not Christian activity for spirituality.—Rev. W. D. Reid, Montreal.

Things that grow have more intrinsic value than things that are made, said Dr. C. F. Deems in 1887 of the cause.

My friends, boil down a Congregationalist and you will get the double essence of the Fourth of July.—Dr. J. L. Hill.

We claim every man who has even one per cent. of colored blood in his veins. He is still a negro.—Booker T. Washington.

It is because there has been a deepening of the spiritual life that this mustard seed has waxed a great tree.—Secretary Baer.

The combination of the Chautauqua salute and a volume of praise such as those tent audiences created will not be forgotten.

Was it strange that among the most popular hymns were Let a Little Sunshine In, Sunshine in My Soul, Scatter Sunshine?

One of the penalties of ignorance is that the unlearned must forego the keen delight of imparting knowledge.—Rev. L. A. Banks Wherever Christian Endeavor has attacked the saloon it has found the spoils politicians intrenched behind the screens.—Rev. H. H. Russell.

The Endeavorers might well imagine that they had dropped into a gay bazar when they entered the exhibit rooms at the general headquarters.

I believe in the prayer meeting and I believe in the primary, and I believe it to be my duty to be at one as much as at the other.—Dr. P. S. Henson.

Whether Boston will admit that "no such elaborate preparations were ever made for a national convention as in Washington" is an open question.

Should the C. E. Society go into politics? Emphatically, no! Should Christian Endeavorers go into politics? Emphatically, yes!—Rev. William Rader.

Postmaster-General Wilson felt none the less honored than did the convention as he guided one of the largest gatherings through the course of one evening.

If delegates returned home unmarked by souvenirs, badges and emblems it was not the fault of the black and white pickaninnies who swarmed around the grounds.

The original effects produced in the musical selections by the choruses won from the hearers the highest commendations of the magnificent work of the skillful conductors.

The negro sings:

> You give me Jesus
> And you can have all the world, and the white man takes him at his word.—Pres. B. T. Washington.

There was a general testimony to the improvement in day school deportment as the result of the Junior Endeavor work, a fact which was stated as alone sufficient reward for the efforts of its leaders.

Those were comforting words read by President Clark: "Rain cannot drown Christian Endeavor and wind cannot blow it away, for He maketh small drops of water and fair weather cometh out of the north."

Neal Dow's urgent message to the convention from his home struck a tone which reverberated time after time as the evidence that Endeavorers know their duty in regard to the liquor traffic and are willing to do it.

Every convention committee has its special trials, but the committee of '96 suffered a severe test during its midnight struggle with the elements. Such a gallant contest against odds as that which saved two of the three great tents, and restored within so brief a time the one which collapsed, has called forth the unstinted admiration and commendation of the work of these thoroughly energetic young business men of Washington.

CURRENT THOUGHT.

AT HOME.

John Fiske, in a fascinating article in the July Atlantic says: "The old statical conception of a world created all at once in its present shape was the result of a very narrow experience. . .. Now that our experience is widened, it is outgrown and set aside forever; it is replaced by the dynamical conception of a world on a perpetual process of evolution from one state into another state. . . . We can no more revert to the statical conception than we can turn back the sun in his course." He concludes thus: "We may be sure that the creature whose intelligence measures the pulsations of molecules and unravels the secret of whirling nebula is no creature of a day, but the child of the universe, the heir of all ages, in whose making and perfecting is to be found the consummation of God's creative work." Ex-Minister to England Hon. E. J. Phelps concludes an article on Arbitration and Our Relations to England thus: "The time may come to any country when it is necessary to fight. Self-defense is the highest duty when unhappily necessary to be resorted to, and when the vindication of the national honor or the protection of the essential interests of the country shall be really required. That people is not worthy to be free who would shrink from the duty or stop to count the cost."

The New York Christian Advocate has little save contempt for Leo XIII.'s recent encyclical and Mr. Gladstone's recent letter: "There is but one thing equal in absurdity to the doctrine of the infallibility of the Pope, from our point of view, in the history of ecclesiastical pretension, and that is the doctrine of apostolical succession as held by High Church Anglicans and Protestant Episcopalians. Gladstone is a High Churchman. His recent letter is but the full effluence of what he has taught and employed and occasionally expressed whenever he has referred to the subject. We could accept the Quakerism of George Fox more readily than we could take either of these pretensions. The contrast between these pretensions and all that can be directly inferred from the teachings of Christ is stupendous."

ABROAD.

Light and Leading, a clever representative of the British Sunday school workers, commenting on Prof. and Dr. Agar Beet's mission to the United States to arouse sympathy for Armenia, cites it as "a sign of the more sensible diplomatic missions of the future, which will not be from court to court, but from people to people. Our Foreign Office in its present form is an obsolete survival, useless where it is not mischievous. All the good work that it might do is now better done by other agencies. While Lord Salisbury's secretaries were pottering over their bogus maps and cooked reports Mr. Henry Norman landed at New York, and in two or three days discovered the truth and saved two great nations from war. . . . The growing organization and solidarity of the labor movement all over the world will soon deliver the diplomatic service from its aristocratic monopolists. The agricultural laborer of Somerset does not really want to fight the Breton peasant or even the Soudanese dervish. When those on whom falls the actual burden of war have an opportunity of speaking there will be no war."

The London Spectator confesses its "complete intellectual discomfiture" in studying the helplessness of the Spanish army in Cuba —an army more that twice as large as the whole British army in India—and adds, "The Spaniards are perfectly capable of holding on until they are unable to raise any more money and then of retiring, as they did originally from the Spanish colonies, without conceding any terms whatever. . . . We see no reason why the rich island should not for a time sink into the position occupied by several Spanish-American provinces after the war of occupation—that of a practically derelict state, left almost without an appearance of government, with a thin population struggling to keep a little food out of the hands of marauders. Spain cannot conquer the island, its inhabitants will not be able, from their divisions, to govern it in a civilized way, and the United States will neither take it itself nor suffer anybody else. . . . We are all optimists nowadays, but then none of us ever saw a community deliberately destroying its own means of remaining civilized, with a great army looking on in a sort of trance."

ABSENT.

My friend, I need thee in good days or ill,
I need the counsel of thy larger thought;
And I would question all the year has brought—
What spoil of books, what victories of will;
But most I long for the old wordless thrill,
When on the shore, like children picture-taught,
We watched each miracle the sweet day wrought,
While the tide ebbed and every wind was still.

Dear, let it be again as if we mused,
We two, with never need of spoken word
(While the sea's fingers twined among the dulse,
And gulls dipped near), our spirits seeming fused
In the great Life that quickens wave and bird,
Our hearts in happy rhythm with the world-pulse.
—Ellen Burroughs.

"I should like visiting a great deal better," said a curly-haired boy of seven, "if people wouldn't laugh at everything I say." In vain did his mother explain that the laughing wasn't making fun of him, but rather a kind of applause, since, not being accustomed to children, everything he said or did seemed to them bright, amusing or "cunning." "I can't help it," he said, "I don't think it's polite, and I don't believe they would if any one laughed at them." This feeling in a child is normal; indeed, if he enjoys being conspicuous and having his remarks treated with undue attention, he has lost one of the chief charms of childhood. It sometimes seems as if well-meaning but injudicious grown people would spoil every attractive child whom they chance to know. They need to realize that children are happiest when given only their proper share of notice and attention.

Comparatively few housekeepers avail themselves of the valuable information gratuitously furnished by the United States Government. The Department of Agriculture publishes from time to time pamphlets prepared by specialists which summarize the results of many careful investigations. One recently issued gives the composition and fuel value of various cuts of meat, with intelligent directions concerning their cooking, and statements in regard to the meat extracts in common use. The fact that the smaller the roast the hotter should be the fire is emphasized and explained. It is also asserted that the nearly tasteless mass of fibers left after making broths has decided nutritive value and is as easily and completely digested as the same weight of roast, hence what many call "refuse" is properly "waste," since it may be served as an agreeable and nutritive food. Much of interest is also told about the flavor of meats and their digestibility, while diagrams make clear, even to a novice, from just what part of the animal each "cut" is taken. In short it would be difficult to get more useful facts in a few pages than are found in this Farmer's Bulletin, No. 34, which any one may have for the asking.

It is comforting to find that so wise a student of human life as Mr. W. D. Howells is not among the pessimistic grumblers who are complaining of the decay of the home, doubtfully questioning the effect of the higher education of woman and sighing for the good old times when home was something more than a mere place in which to eat and sleep. In a recent article in Harper's Weekly, replying to a correspondent who declares that we are drifting away from the home, Mr. Howells says: "I fancy that home was always much rarer than we think, and I do not believe that it is rarer now than ever. Indeed, if there are more comfort and more widespread ease and leisure among us, the conditions for the home are more favorable, for it is useless to deny that where there is great poverty, as where there is great luxury, the conditions for the home are bad." He is inclined to answer in the negative the inquiry whether it would not be well for our women's colleges to have courses of home science, including child study, husband study, etc., sensibly declaring that "home comes from the heart, not from the head, of woman; it cannot be taught; it is of her nature, if it is at all, and it is not reasonable to expect the home of every woman. It is the ideal condition for most women, as it is for most men, but it is no more so in one case than in the other."

"I DON'T LIKE IT."

BY AGNES B. ORMSBEE.

There is nothing that is clung to so pertinaciously as one's likes and dislikes in food. Yet there is nothing that is so generally based on mere whim. There are few articles of food that are wholly hurtful; some methods of cooking may make certain foods indigestible, but nearly all foods, wholesomely prepared, are good to eat, and we are greatly benefited by a varied diet. We were made to eat all kinds of food, and it is in accordance with this natural law that we give children a more liberal diet when their teeth have come. It is not because it is too much trouble to prepare the milk and the other foods of babyhood. We might continue them and give children the scientific amounts of bone, muscle and blood-making, concentrated extracts, but they would not thrive. Their stomachs would not grow and there would be no reserved strength and less vitality. Yet people sensible on most points will limit their diet for a lifetime. Having taken a dislike to mutton, cauliflower or salads in childhood, wild horses could not induce them to eat them at forty years of age, although this very setness makes them unpleasant members of a household.

It is granted that there is occasionally a personal or inherited peculiarity which renders certain foods poisons to some people, or ill-health or abuse may have brought on that greatest torment—dyspepsia. But if one will honestly separate proven hurtful food from the diet there will be a long or short list of dishes one does not eat because one will not. This silly position is not only adhered to personally but handed down and taught to children. Why should Johnny eat what he does not like? Because a varied diet will give him better health, because his appetite will be more even, because he will be less liable to be ill when taken away from home and his diet changed, and because it will save him much embarrassment and suffering when, grown older, he goes out from the home table either as a guest at a fine feast or a victim of the hospitalities of a boarding house. A young man described his miseries when he found himself a guest at dinner with raw oysters before him. His pride would not let him refuse them and his fear to try them made him positively chilly. "How I did wish my mother had made me eat them when a boy at home. I tried one and nearly died in swallowing it, for it seemed like a mouse to me. But I learned my lesson and now I try to eat everything set before me."

When an adult is ill he can generally be persuaded to take such nourishment as is best, but with a child it is different. If he has been allowed to eat when and how he pleases, and to decide on what he eats, he cannot be expected to yield then without a struggle. And many a poor little fellow has used up more vitality in his fight against a cup of milk than medicines could restore in hours, while sometimes life itself depends on taking proper food.

To begin at the source and with the individual is the only satisfactory way to mend any evil, and this is where bad and foolish habits in eating can best be cured. Children should be taught little by little to eat meats, fish, vegetables, fruits, cereals, salads and soups from the first. Make a child eat oatmeal? Yes, there was once a family where it was called "penance," but the children were coaxed to eat it two or three times a week, a teaspoonful at a time. After a while they learned to like it, and as a result of the oatmeal and other coarse foods now have fine teeth. Beans were learned two at a time, soups by the spoonful and raw oysters by the half of one. By this method they became unusually healthy, though two of them started life handicapped with weak stomachs. They were pleasant children as guests for they bravely ate what was set before them, and in illness "they were the easiest children to manage I ever took care of," was the testimony of a trained nurse.

Let us of older growth set a sensible example by trying to overcome our oddities of taste, and having prepared our food attractively let us eat it, for surely our days, whether long or short, will be more comfortable, our bodies better nourished and our tempers sweeter than if we continually yield to our long fostered whims and say, "I don't like it."

MEN AND FASHION.

BY KATE UPSON CLARK.

We hear a great deal of the abject slavery of woman to fashion. In fact, the women themselves admit it frankly. There is not one of us who does not see every day women, in most respects conscientious and sensible, unhealthfully pinching their feet, their hands, their bodies, dragging around skirts far too long and too heavy, wearing enormous hats to entertainments, to the wrath and discomfort of those who sit behind them, and living in a constant, shivering fear of being out of the fashion. Women stand out so prominently in this regard that we are apt to overlook the fact that their brothers carry almost as heavy a burden.

It is undoubtedly true that men are even more afraid of displaying any unconventional feature in their attire than are women. If this is not so, why do they not wear soft hats instead of stiff ones, especially the absurd high beaver hats? Yet more than half, possibly three-quarters, of our men never wear, unless during the relaxation of the summer vacation, anything but stiff hats, usually of that durable and convenient, but extremely unbecoming and probably unhealthy, shape called the Derby. The negligee shirt is neat, comfortable, economical and becoming. The ordinary shirt, with its necessary adjuncts of stiff collar and cuffs and boardlike bosom, is uncom fortable to work in and still more so to lounge in, unbecoming to most complexions, expensive at first cost and even more so in laundering, and pronounced by physicians decidedly unhygienic; yet how many men dare to be seen in negligee shirts after the heats of summer are past?

Creased trousers, "toothpick" shoes and the absolute uniformity of evening dress—which, however, has its fine democracy to recommend it—further illustrate our point. Fortunately, the styles of the main articles of masculine attire are far more convenient and comfortable than the corresponding ones for women, or else the business of the world would be seriously crippled by what students of sociology declare to be an increasing tendency on the part of men to avoid making themselves conspicuous by conforming rigidly to the accepted standards, no matter how unreasonable they may be.

This conservative tendency is shown even more by men's treatment of the women of their families. One wealthy and beautiful New York woman, who finds corsets unendurable, has at three separate times attempted to wear them habitually at the request of her husband. Three painful attacks of illness have followed these attempts in turn, and he now allows her her own way in the matter, though with constant worrying allusions to the disagreeable variation which she presents to the common type. This same unfortunate woman is obliged to wear long gowns every day, because her husband likes them. Every woman enjoys "trailing around" in silks and satins in a drawing-room, but when one is compelled to carry a trained skirt constantly about it becomes a torment, to say nothing of the strength which it uselessly consumes and the impalpable dust which it causes one to breathe continually.

The silly vanity of husbands is not confined to the so-called "fashionable classes." A hard-working farmer's wife was one day complaining to her husband of her kitchen frock. "I came up from the cellar this morning," she said, "with a plate of butter in one hand and a jug of vinegar in the other. I stepped on my dress on nearly every stair, and finally it tripped me up. I fell down several stairs and my candle, vinegar and butter were all mixed together. I have a great mind," she went on, tentatively, "to wear something quite short around the house—something like bloomers. I needn't ever wear them outside, and only the nearest neighbors would ever know that I had them. I could do twice the work that I do now, and I shouldn't get half so tired."

But her husband would not allow her to make any change, and that poor woman is probably to this day making her difficult pilgrimages up the cellar stairs daily, and tripping at every step.

A woman who walks a great deal with her husband often calls his attention to the resistance which she encounters with every movement. "If it costs you one dollar's worth of strength to walk a mile," she calculated one day, "it costs me fully two dollars' worth. In spite of all my efforts, my petticoats will impede me, by clinging about my ankles. The mere lifting forward of my gown is a baffling and incessant hindrance. Now a divided skirt is not conspicuous, or I might have a moderate bicycle skirt, just for walking."

But her husband was afraid that any sort of a departure from the conventional costume might cause people to stare, and would not consent to try any experiments.

Women are naturally timid and anxious to please. When their husbands and brothers get courage to urge the adoption of modes of dress which promote health and allow freedom of movement among our women, then, and not until then, will there be a general dress reform. Such a reform is not only in the line of progress in civilization and true religion, but it would greatly increase the amount of beauty and grace in the world and promote the gayety of nations. In view of the servility to fashion displayed at present by men, however, there is not much to hope from them at present for the alleviation of the woes which that implacable goddess imposes upon their meek sisters.

SUMMER STUDIES.

Why shouldst thou study in the month of June
In dusky books of Greek and Hebrew lore,
When the great Teacher of all glorious things Passes in hourly light before thy door?

There is a greater book unrolling now;
Fair are its leaves as is the tree of heaven,
All veined and dewed and gemmed with wondrous signs,
To which a healing, mystic power is given.

Now is the glorious resurrection time,
When all earth's buried beauties have new birth;
Behold the yearly miracle complete—
God hath created a new heaven and earth.

No tree that wants its joyful garments now,
No flower but hastes his bravery to don;
God bids thee to this marriage feast of joy,
Let thy soul put the wedding garment on.

Hast thou no time for all this wondrous show—
No thought to spare? Wilt thou forever be
With thy last year's dry flower stalk and dead leaves,
And no new shoot or blossom on thy tree?

Cease, cease to think and be content to be;
Swing safe at anchor in fair nature's bay;
Reason no more, but o'er thy quiet soul
Let God's sweet teachings ripple their soft way.

Soar with the birds and flutter with the leaf;
Dance with the seedy grass in fringy play;
Sail with the cloud, wave with the dreaming pine,
And float with nature all the livelong day.

Call not such hours an idle waste of time—
Land that lies fallow gains a quiet power;
It treasures from the brooding of God's wings
Strength to unfold the future tree and flower.

FRESH AIR STUDIES.

THE BRILLIANT FIREFLIES.

BY GEORGE ETHELBERT WALSH.

At the close of a warm, sultry day in summer, when the whip-poor-will is calling from some neighboring fence and the screech owl mournfully is imitating the cry of a distressed child, myriads of bright, flashing lights gradually appear in the dusk, and convert the country meadows and lawns into a fairyland. Every bush and tree is hung with innumerable flashing lights, and every spear of grass glows with the light of the fireflies or of glowworms. The attempt to catch one of these moving lights is much like chasing the ignis fatuus, or will-o'-the-wisp. But if one is nimble of foot and quick of motion a tiny firefly may be imprisoned in the warm hand and carried triumphantly to the house.

Place the little creature under an inverted tumbler on the open page of a book or newspaper, and turn out the lights. In a few moments the insect will flash out its penetrating light, and if the flash would only last longer one could make out the fine print of the paper. If several are placed under the glass a continuous light is obtained by the combined pulsations of the fireflies. To illustrate the penetrating power of the light hide one in a handkerchief, covering it with several folds, and the successive gleams can be readily detected in the dark room.

The mystery of the fireflies becomes more perplexing when one attempts to study the luminous portion of the body. While holding the insect in the hand it flashes out its light, boldly challenging the captors to explain the mystery. The abdomen simply lights up and then grows opaque again. It resembles a flash of electric light as much as anything, except that the gleam is less intense and of greenish-orange color. What causes the light? In Italy many ignorant peasants have a superstition that the little creatures are the spirits of departed friends, and they look upon them with awe and dread, not daring to injure or kill one. It was the custom in this country years ago to speak of the "bottled up" light of the fireflies, and to describe them as small electric batteries. Science has been closely studying the question, and the nearest approach to a solution of the mystery is briefly this. The light is produced by phosphorescence, and this is made possible only by certain chemical actions under peculiar conditions. One condition is that oxygen must be present, and also potash, soda or other alkalies. In all animal tissues we find certain alkaline compounds, and the air supplies the oxygen needed. The chemical action necessary to produce the light is started by the respiration and pulsations of the insects. This is made manifest by capturing the creature, for when pursued and caught it becomes excited, and the respiration is quicker and the light flashes correspondingly faster.

The part of the body emitting the flash is composed of fatty matter which is traversed by innumerable small breathing tubes. Every time the creature breathes this fatty substance will be seen to pulsate. The breathing thus causes the chemical action to take place, and the light flashes out. In other words, the fireflies store up a quantity of fatty matter in the cells provided by nature, and the gradual oxidation of this substance causes the luminosity which attracts our attention on dark summer nights. The slow, sluggish insects have less brilliancy than the quick, active flies, which also goes to prove that rapid pulsation increases the process of oxidation, and hence the power and frequency of the flashes.

The luminous insects represent quite a large class, and are found in nearly all parts of the globe. In tropical America they attain the largest size and make a light much more brilliant and steady than those seen in this country. The lantern fly of Guiana has been called the "splendid one" because of its intense luminosity. This creature is a beetle, a close relative of the "seventeen-year locust," and its light is carried upon its head. In Brazil and the West Indies the fireflies are so plentiful and brilliant that ladies wear them as ornaments. The flies are caught and placed in light gauze bags which can be attached to the hat, clothes or hair. In Brazil there is an annual festival when the boys and girls ornament their heads, clothes and horses with the brilliant fireflies. The effect is strangely beautiful as the procession parades through the dark streets.

In South America the demand for fireflies is so general that they form a considerable article of trade, and natives make a business of catching them alive. Sticks with lights on them are waved in the air near nets held by the natives, and attracted by the flashing gleams of light the fireflies and beetles approach, when they are scooped in by the folds of netting. After they are caught they are placed carefully in netted boxes and fed on sugar-cane until sold in the market. These brilliant night ornaments have to be fed regularly by the dusky belles who wear them, and they probably receive the best of care.

THE WAY MILLY WAS CURED.

BY E. S. TRAZMORE.

Milly's bed was near the window which looked out upon the great spreading elms. Mrs. Anderson, the rich woman who had given so much money to build the hospital, had insisted that this particular corner should be Milly's, and she usually had her way. It had been visitors' day, and the last friend had clicked carefully down the broad iron staircase. The room was quiet, for all the other children were lost in the land of dreams. Milly alone was awake. Her poor bent back ached, and she had no loving mother to take her gently and try to quiet the pain. But Milly was an orphan, and as she was only one of forty children who lived in this great room, all under the care of two nurses, she had learned that she must be brave about her pain and bear it silently.

After Mrs. Anderson, who always called Milly "my little girl," went away, bedtime had come—if so it could be called when the sick children had to lie abed all the time—and Nurse Adams had let out the hard straps which kept Milly's back quite straight all the long, long days. This rested her and the pain didn't seem half so hard to bear. She looked out the window and watched the beams of the great silver moon as they crept nearer and nearer along the roof just outside the glass. Milly was wondering what Mrs. Anderson meant by her parting words. The lady looked extremely pleasant and said that something good was going to happen, and then she went away. So Milly lay thinking it all over, and then the next she knew the bright sunshine was pouring in at the windows!

That morning the doctor came into the room, bringing three other men with him. One had clear, brown eyes, which had a way of twinkling whenever he looked at one that made it easy to smile in return, and a pleasant voice. Then the nurses brought a screen, which was drawn all about Milly's bed, and after a careful examination the doctor with the merry brown eyes said, "Yes. It can be done!" Then they all looked as wise as possible and went away.

The next day something strange happened. A queer looking chair on wheels was brought into the room and rolled up to Milly's bedside. Upon this chair, which was long and flat, was placed a pretty brown mattress. Nurse Adams and Nurse Brown lifted Milly from her bed and laid her down upon this very gently. Then they drew the chair away, and the other children did not know where she was going. Milly did not ask—she was so glad of this little journey away from that great room, with its white regiment of beds. The chair was wheeled to a glass door in the wall, and Nurse Brown touched a tiny knob and something went trrrrrrrtwing, and a little room suddenly appeared at the door in the wall which rolled back. They wheeled the chair right into this room, which Milly knew must have wings, for a boy who wore a blue suit with gold bands, which said "elevator," upon his sleeves, pulled a shining handle, and up-up-up went the room—yes, the whole room, chair, nurses, Milly and all!

Soon they stopped and the chair was rolled out again through a broad hall into another room which had no furniture, except a wide table, some chairs and a leather-covered sofa. There was a broad shelf and upon it were a great many bottles, big and little. A queer odor pervaded the room, but no one seemed to notice it. Two men came forward and lifted the mattress, with Milly upon it, right onto the broad table, which she thought was strange. Still, as everybody smiled kindly, and as Mrs. Anderson entered the room just at that moment and came close to her, she thought the whole arrangement quite a joke and laughed in a very jolly way. Mrs. Anderson put her arms gently about her and pressed her face down close to Milly's.

"My dear child," she whispered, "the doctors told me that I might come here to-day and tell you that they are going to cure this poor back of yours, and after you are well enough to be moved I am going to take you to a dear mother who wants you to be her little girl, because her own child has just gone back to God. Now Nurse Adams will put this handkerchief over your face for a few moments, and I want you to keep tight hold of my hands, for you are my little girl just now, you know. Be as brave as you can, and if you feel frightened, dear, remember that I tell you that it will be all right. You can trust me."

She stepped aside to give place to the doctor with the merry brown eyes, who came up to the table. He twinkled those eyes at Milly in so comical a manner that she smiled bravely in response. Then he turned to the physician with the pointed beard and smiled again, and Milly heard the word "plucky." Then Nurse Adams came and leaned over her and placed an odd looking tin thing, which had a white handkerchief inside of it, right over Milly's nose and mouth. It had a queer odor, which she did not like, but she held on to Mrs. Anderson's hands tighter and tighter. It seemed so strange, too, to hear voices from ever so far away: "There, there! Never mind! There, there! It's all right—all—right—right—ri"—and there came a queer jumping-off place, and everything rushed by so fast, O so fast! Then she—forgot.

I saw Milly yesterday. She was on her way to her home, and was walking quite easily. If you did not notice just a tiny limp, you would never dream that she had not always been a strong, healthy child. She goes every visitors' day to the hospital, and is a great favorite with all the doctors, nurses and the little sick children. She has a beautiful home, for Mrs. Anderson kept her word, and Milly was adopted by a friend soon after the time she went to sleep in so queer a way and that painful back was cured.

Closet and Altar

Prayers are to the soul what the dew of God is to the flowers. Why should not that gracious dew fall even now and always for all of us upon the fields of life?

God knows our needs before we ask. Then what is prayer for? Not to inform him, nor to move him, unwilling, to have mercy, as if like some proud prince he required a certain amount of recognition of his greatness as the price of his favors. But to fit our own hearts by conscious need and true desire and dependence to receive the gifts which he is ever willing to give, but which we are not always fit to receive. As St. Augustine has it, the empty vessel is by prayer carried to the full fountain.—Alexander Maclaren.

The prayer of faith availeth much:
Thou hearest such;
Thy hand we in the darkness touch.
O, not apart
Stayest thou on some high throne, all-loving Heart!
Helper in times of need, we know thou art.
—Lucy Larcom.

To attempt to lead the spiritual life without devotion is even a greater mistake than to go apart from our duties in order to lead it. Our flying on God's errands will be an unhallowed flight if we do not first secretly adore him in our hearts. A prayerless day of hard work consecrated by no holy meditation—O, what a dull, plodding, tramping day it is! How do we spend money in such a day for that which is not bread and our labor for that which satisfieth not. How does God in such a day deal with us as with the Egyptians of old, taking off the chariot wheels from our work so that we drive it heavily.—Edward M. Goulburn.

The prayers I make will then be sweet indeed,
If thou the spirit give by which I pray;
My unassisted heart is barren clay,
That of its native self can nothing feed;
Of good and pious works thou art the seed,
That quickens only when thou say'st it may;
Unless thou show to us thine own true way
No man can find it; Father, thou must lead.
Do thou, then breathe those thoughts into my mind,
By which such virtue may in me be bred
That in thy holy footsteps I may tread;
The fetters of my tongue do thou unbind,
That I may have the power to sing of thee,
And sound thy praises everlastingly.
—Michael Angelo.

Almighty God, coming to a king, what shall we ask for? Thou dost encourage us to open our mouth widely and thou wilt fill it. In the time of our hunger and thirst do thou give us satisfaction, in the hour of our weariness do thou carry us up the steep road. In our faintness and utter loneliness, when the sense of orphanage comes upon us, and the whole life is one bare wilderness to our eyes, then let thy Fatherhood come down upon us as a mighty revelation, as a complete succor, as a thorough and abiding defense, and in the Fatherhood of God, made known to us through Jesus Christ alone, may we find completeness of character, entireness of rest, yea, even the peace which passeth all understanding. And when this time of trial is done, and the cold, gray twilight vanishes, may our eyes be open to behold the morning and to see the King in the fullness of his beauty. Amen.

61. A CATALOGUE OF CATS.

1. The cat of a sailor who braves briny billows.
2. The cat that is somehow of kin to the willows.
3. The cat that I own is but part of a cat.
4. The next one is equal to nine such as that.
5. The cat that is sadly addicted to scratching.
6. The cat that is given to stealing and snatching.
7. The cat that will pinch, and it seems rather funny.
8. It sometimes is known as the cat that makes money.
9. The cat with a metal for making the same.
10. The cat that the sum will be able to name.
11. The cat that is terribly biting and sharp.
12. The cat that is noted for playing the harp.
13. The cat that takes supper, without more apology.
14. The cat that develops a taste for theology.
15. The cat that can shout, at a theater found.
16. The cat that attends to the science of sound.
17. The cat that is heavy and solid and square.
18. The cat well provided for dressing her hair.
19. The cat that is ready to tumble or drop.
20. And last is the cat that is always on top.

62. WORD CHANGES.

[A change of one letter at each "move" gives a new word. Example: Change cent to dime in four moves. Answer: Cent, dent, dint, dine, dime.]

1. Change from peach to grape in six moves.
2. Change from wheat to flour in seven moves.
3. Change from black to white in eight moves.
4. Change from blue to gray in seven moves.
5. Change from gain to loss in eight moves.
6. Change from rich to poor in eight moves.
7. Change from pen to ink in nine moves.

64. MY INITIAL PICNIC.

This is a list of some of the famous people who came to my picnic. You must do as I had to do—guess their names from their initials and the initials of the refreshments they brought.

First to arrive were a (1) RATHER LANK SCOTCHMAN, who brought some REALLY LUSCIOUS SHERBET, and an (2) ENTERTAINING, BOOK-LOVING BRUNETTE, with some EXCELLENT BOILED BEEF.

An (3) EXCEEDINGLY APPALLING POET brought some EXCELLENT APPLE PIES; the (4) DEATHLESS GEHENNA RECORDER, a lot of DELICIOUS GRILLED ROACH; and the (5) HOSPITABLE WAYSIDE LANDLORD fetched over a large tubful of HEAVILY WATERED LEMONADE.

One (6) REPUTABLE TIDY CREATURE brought an immense RICH, TOOTHSOME CAKE; the (7) RENOWNED WRITER ESSAYS had a basket full of REFRESHINGLY WHOLESOME EDIBLES; the (8) EXQUISITE SCRIBBLING PATRICIAN gave us some EXCEPTIONALLY SOUR PICKLES; a (9) SUAVE, WILY ROYALIST had for his share some SEGARS WONDROUSLY REDOLENT; and last, but by no means least, a (10) FAMOUS DOMESTIC HOUSEWIFE brought FOURTEEN DRIED HALIBUT.

Our picnic was pronounced a great success by the distinguished guests, and, after devouring all the toothsome edibles provided for our benefit, we departed for our respective places of abode, some to the realms of the shady past and others to homes on earth.

MYSTICALIA.

65. ENIGMA.

On an island rock in a bay
A castle stands; and in its day
It many captives held, they say.
Should we this rock embrace,
A woman stares us in the face,
And she is not one out of place.

The joining of the chain proved to be a stumbling-block, as was anticipated, and many have insisted that the task could not be accomplished at a cost less than 77 cents. The correct solution, however, is convincing.

FOR SUNDAY AFTERNOONS.

Several of our readers have expressed their increased pleasure in reading and memorizing hymns since our publication of a few facts explaining the circumstances under which they were written. We therefore append brief explanatory notes concerning four more:

From Greenland's icy mountains.

This most popular of all missionary hymns was written in 1819 at Wrexham, where Bishop Heber's father-in-law, Dr. Shipley, Dean of St. Asaph, was vicar. On Whitsunday Dr. Shipley was to preach in Wrexham church a sermon in aid of the propagation of the gospel in foreign parts, and Reginald Heber, then vicar of Hodnet, happened to be staying at the vicarage at the time. On the Saturday before Whitsunday the dean, Heber and a few friends were in the library together, when the Dean asked his son-in-law to write "something for them to sing in the morning." Heber readily consented, and retired to the farther end of the room for the purpose. When asked what he had written he replied by reading the first three verses, which he had then composed. His listeners were delighted, and it was sung for the first time the next morning in Wrexham church.

O, could I speak the matchless worth.

Samuel Medley, a British midshipman, after his conversion in 1767, finding an irrepressible vein of song in his soul, began to write hymns. A little blind girl sat on the doorsteps of the church and sold them for a halfpenny to the congregation as they came out. One was this glorious hymn. After it floated over to America Dr. Hastings composed his splendid air of "Ariel" for it, and to that it will ever be wedded. Medley had the gift of rapid composition. One day, when visiting at the house of Mr. Philips in London, he said to the daughter of his host, "Betsey, will you bring me some paper and ink?" He went to his room and presently came back and handed Betsey his famous hymn of Loving Kindness.

Onward, Christian Soldiers.

This soul-stirring hymn was written in a great hurry by Rev. S. Baring-Gould for the author's missions at Hisbury Bridge about the year 1865. Here the children had to march many a long mile to take part in a school feast. Owing to the distance from the church to the scene of the festivities an early start was necessary, and marching in procession with banners waving, colors flying and a cross preceding them the little ones sang lustily all the way. It was sung at that time to Gauntlet's tune.

Father whate'er of bliss.

This was composed by Mrs. Steele under peculiar circumstances. In her youth the day for her marriage had been appointed. A few hours before the time designated her lover was taken ill and died. In sweet submission she composed this hymn after the sad event.

The Conversation Corner.

[Private note to D. F.: Here are three more pictures of your Mexican friends. Insert them in the Corner for July 16 in this order: 1. The three young gentlemen with the jugs on their backs—doesn't it make your back ache to look at them? I do not suppose you know anything—excuse me, I mean—about that open door in the background of this picture, but if you do, get the Proof Reader to express it properly and insert in proper place below. 2. The three other gentlemen, who have stopped to have Mr. W. take their pictures. I do not suppose they ever dreamed that they and their old go-cart would be printed in the Corner—perhaps they never heard of the Corner nor of you! 3. That dreary, not to say despotic, looking donkey—what an expressive under-jaw he has!—MR. M.]

These three additional photographs, taken by "our own artist," represent other "conveyances" connected with home life in Central America. The letter accompanying them is as follows:

Mr. Martin: The Second Report of the Corner's World's Transportation Commission, by its Mexican Commissioner, has to do with three methods of carrying water. Very few towns in Mexico have adequate water systems, and the supply is scanty. Usually there are public fountains at more or less frequent intervals, supplied by aqueducts or springs, or perhaps rain-water cisterns. From these the water is conveyed in jars to the homes of the people. Each section of the country has a jar of characteristic shape and the method of carrying it is also peculiar. Here are three pictures, three kinds of jars, and three different methods of carrying them. W.

None of these "conveyances" look particularly lively! How would Cornerers like to live in such a country as that? I think I should prefer a country made comfortable and prosperous by Protestant civilization. But I wish our "Mexican Commissioner" had told us something about the people and their homes, and especially about the children. Do you notice those faces in the last picture? I wonder if Mr. W. talked with them—in Spanish—or gave them some picture papers. Just as I wrote that last word I saw a man out on the lawn who came to straighten up a young maple which was growing wrong. He put a cord around the tree and tied it to a strong stake, the but tree would not come quite straight. Then the old man shook his head, saying, "You should have taken it when it was younger!"

Ask your parents if they remember "parsing" this couplet in Pope's Essay on Man in their school days:

'Tis education forms the common mind,
Just as the twig is bent the tree's inclined.

Perhaps you can see the moral of the little maple when applied to little Mexicans—or little 'mericans; if we want to be fine trees by and by, we must begin to grow straight when we are young!

At this point the "old Captain" brings me an urgent query from an American girl; she wishes the poem from which this verse is remembered:

'Twas autumn, and the leaves were dry,
And rustled on the ground,
And chilly winds went whistling by,
With slow and pensive sound.

It is rather hard to imagine any chilly winds going whistling by just now, but I have no doubt some old scrap-book or school reader will have the piece. I have had another query in waiting for the Fourth of July number, but you remember D. F. wouldn't give me room for a single firecracker!

MAINE.

Dear Mr. Martin: Can you or any of your "associates" give me the second stanza of the following poem? I remember hearing my older brothers and sisters sing it.

This is my own, my native land,
Though poor and rough she be;
The home of many a noble soul,
The birthplace of the free.
I'll love her rocks and rivers
Till death my quick blood chills [or stills];
Then hurrah for old New England,
And her cloud-capped granite hills!

Who remembers a similar quotation from a famous poem of Scott's about "My own, my native land?"

Elephants on a Toboggan Slide. A writer in the (London) Boys' Own Paper has an article by Mr. R. D'O. Martin—no relative of mine—upon Wild Elephants at Play. The playground is a mountain in South India called Anachaddi—ana, elephant, and chaddi, a playground. Besides occasional clearings in the jungle where they run and romp is their great toboggan slide. It is an immense slab of rock on the steep hillside, worn smooth as glass by long elephantine use. This, Mr. Martin says, was made by the elephants hundreds of years ago—although I do not see how he knows, unless he is a very old man—and down its steep slope they slide with the glee of schoolboys. On the side is a well-beaten path where they walk up to take another slide. Although this particular chaddi was made by these huge sportsmen so long ago they often make new ones. This is the case when in making their migrations on paths used for a century or two (?) they find that some human usurper has made a clearing and settled upon it. They evidently say to one another, "Go to, now, let us have a chaddi here," and by morning the slide is made. If the owner is in his bungalow he decides to "go to," too, in double-quick time, while the merry beasts make havoc of his house. If I were a schoolboy I would get up a composition on the Sports of Elephants, ransacking the libraries for information.

How Many Grandfathers Have You? That Mr. Martin of the Boys' Own Paper may be my cousin after all, for I have just seen in another London magazine (the Leisure Hour) a curious statement that every man in England may be descended from William the Conqueror or his companions. The ground for this is the enormous number of ancestors every person has, and so the wide relationship belonging to him in the past generations. How many ancestors have each one of you? If you are the ninth generation—as is probably the case—from the Pilgrims of 1620, you have 508 lineal ancestors, if I have reckoned it rightly, besides your father and mother. That is, you have two grandfathers and two grandmothers, eight great grandparents, and so on, doubling with every generation. Reckon it yourselves back to John Alden or William Bradford or Miles Standish and see how many forefathers and foremothers you have. Then go back in the same way for twenty generations and you will find that you have had nearly two million ancestors, not counting any cousins at all! No doubt that Mr. R. D'O. Martin is my cousin, though distant, and no doubt, also, we Cornerers are nearly all cousins—delightful thought, isn't it?

LESSON FOR JULY 26. 2 Sam. 7: 4–16.

GOD'S PROMISES TO DAVID.

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D. D.

The king of Israel had reached the zenith of his ambition. He had won the throne of Israel. He had unified the nation. He had conquered its enemies. He had gained an impregnable capital, and established his court in a royal palace. With peace came the opportunity to develop the strength of his kingdom and the character of his people. Fortunate is the man who has had high aims and has fulfilled them while yet in his prime. If he is worthy of his good fortune, he recognizes that God has given him success, and he wants to show his gratitude worthily. Much of the highest prosperity of our country is due to men who have won wealth and power by honorable use of their talents and realize their responsibility to God. They build colleges, churches, libraries, they plan for the education of the people, at home and abroad, in the same spirit that David had when the desire to build a temple at Jerusalem took possession of him. He was then probably about forty-five years old. He had a large and inspiring vision of what he might accomplish for the nation. The way he was led in carrying out that vision is fraught with important lessons invaluable to those who learn their meaning while the future is still before them. The divine guidance of David in his plans to honor God includes:

1. A noble purpose disallowed. David sought to deepen and direct the religious life of Israel by giving to it a magnificent place of worship. That would help the people to realize the presence of God, to reverence his law, to serve him faithfully. The bringing of the ark to Jerusalem had been the cause and the effect of a national revival of religion. The building of a temple would carry the work still farther. Whenever a man rises to the opportunity which has been given him to bring to his fellowmen a richer knowledge and keener sense of God, the greatest blessing comes to himself. One may well covet the privilege of a man like Dr. Pearsons of Chicago, who has amassed by his consecrated energies a large fortune, has held to the simplicity of his earlier life and in his mature years plants colleges which will give Christian education to multitudes of young men and women. The Gentiles, Christ said, called those who exercised authority over others benefactors. But real greatness of character is won only by doing service to others up to the limit of one's ability.

Of course the prophet Nathan encouraged David to go and do all that was in his heart when he heard of the king's purpose. But time and thought and fuller knowledge so gained of the will of God led the prophet to change his counsel. One reason why David ought not to do this work, he afterwards said, was that he had been a man of war [1 Chron. 28: 3]. Another, perhaps not less potent, may have been that the affairs of the kingdom were not yet sufficiently settled to make it wise to direct the energies of the people to building a very costly temple, fit for the Lord of Hosts. The word of God, the advice of his prophet and the conviction of David were united against the dearest desire of his heart. But in planning for it, and being ready to do it, he did not lose the blessing which would have come to him from building it. No one who is bent on large service for his fellowmen will fail. He may not carry out his plans, but others will take them up and show that it was better for him to lay the foundations than to attempt to build the superstructure. Gen. S. C. Armstrong was always seeing in his visions work for the Negro and the Indian which he never could find money or strength to carry out at Hampton, but through his successors there and Booker Washington at Tuskegee, and through other pupils of his, those larger plans are being realized even beyond what he aimed to do.

2. A better opportunity for service recognized. I have already foreshadowed what this opportunity comes to be for every one who with large plans for God lays foundations which seem to him meager and inadequate. David wanted to build a house for God, but better things than that were in store for him. "The Lord telleth thee that the Lord will build thee an house" [R. V.]. Back through his life the mind of the king of Israel was turned, and he was made to see from what small beginnings he had been lifted to an eminence far greater than he had dreamed of. He had been only a humble shepherd boy but wonderful experiences had come to him, lifting him from the sheepcote to the throne. God had been with him in all these experiences, guiding him to possess a name among the men of world-wide renown. To build a family with power and will to build the temple was greater than to build the temple. David was to be given the opportunity to make a strong nation, rich enough to erect a worthy house for God and strong enough to protect it from enemies. His desire was a worthy one. It was denied him only that he might do a better thing than he had planned. Solomon built the temple; but David has a far more exalted place in the kingdom of God than Solomon. Washington was the leader of the American people when their resources were small and their equipments poor, but what president in later days of our wealth and achievement ranks in honor with the father of his country? Fortunate are the men who, failing to do the great things for God which they have longed to do, have made the way plain for their successors to do them in grander proportions than would have been possible in their own time.

3. Great blessings promised. This lesson would be incomplete without the prayer of David which concludes this chapter. He gratefully accepted the position which God assigned to him, and saw in the message from God the larger purpose of his life. He was to rule over the people whom God chose for himself, and God promised to build for him a royal house through which Jesus Christ should come to rule the world in righteousness. David's acceptance of the promise was a hearty devotion of himself to God's service in order that the promise might be fulfilled. God gives to every man all that the man is able to receive. If, looking back on our lives, we see that he has greatly enriched our characters we may take that as evidence of far greater things to come. "This was yet a small thing in thine eyes," said David. The Christian gladly gives all his life to his Saviour, but if he be really great his service occupies a small place in his thought as compared with his adoring wonder at God's service to him. He works with God and prays, and the more confidently he expects to realize the promises the more earnestly he prays. So his life expands, as he understands more clearly the divine will and enters more intelligently into fellowship with God, till he comes to be crowned a king, because, seeing the Son of God as he is he has become like him.

Literature

SUMMER READING.

It is an unnecessary surrender to the spirit of idleness which makes summer reading merely lazy reading and the mind a conduit for newspaper gossip and the cunningly flavored potations of the lesser novelists. With many of us, whether our holiday be long or short, it is the only time when we are free to read with an unwearied and fully attentive mind, and we ought not to give up the chances of reading with a purpose. What that purpose shall be our own tastes, inclinations and opportunities will determine, but it may be helpful to recall a few of the important publications reviewed by us in the past few months by way of suggestion to those who desire to read intelligently.

There is much to be said in favor of devotional reading. It is difficult in the hurry of our ordinary life to secure the equipoise of mind in which devout thoughts come home to our attention. Such books as Ian Maclaren's The Upper Room, Robertson Nicholl's Seven Words From the Cross, Moxom's Religion of Hope, Walden's Great Meaning of Metanoia, Maclaren's Beatitudes and Other Sermons, Trumbull's Prayer, Its Nature and Scope, or Andrew Murray's The Master's Indwelling will be helpful not only in the time of reading but in the spiritual uplift which will go over for our return to work.

It is a time when acquaintance with the Bible is of the highest importance to the church and the individual, and such a book as Professor Moulton's Literary Study of the Bible would open a new world of thought to many readers. History of the world and of the church may be studied in different phases in Fisher's History of Christian Doctrine; Tyler's The Whence and Whither of Man; H. Clay Trumbull's Threshold Covenant; L. W. Bacon's Irenics and Polemics; Leroy-Beaulieu's Israel Among the Nations and his Empire of the Tzars and the Russians; and in Froude's Council of Trent. Biography invites us with lives of Agassiz, Holmes, Prof. Maria Mitchell, Dolly Madison, President McCosh, the letters of Matthew Arnold and Percival Lowell's lectures on Joan of Arc. If we would study the thought tendencies and spiritual problems of our own age, we have Professor Harris's Moral Evolution; The Spirit in Literature and Life, by Rev. T. P. Coyle; President Schurman's Agnosticism and Religion; Professor Harnack's Christianity and History; and Professor James's Is Life Worth Living? If we desire light upon the practical conduct of life, we have Hamilton Mabie's Essays in Nature and Culture and Dr. Horton's Art of Living Together.

To meet the desire for works in a lighter vein, and one more appropriate to outdoor life, we may have sketches and stories like Robinson's In New England Fields and Woods; Roberts's Earth's Enigmas, in which breathes the very spirit of the Northern woods, where so many of us take refuge in the summertime; Bradford Torrey's Spring Notes from Tennessee; Abbott's Notes of the Night; and the glimpses of England in Alice Brown's By Oak and Thorn.

To come at last to fiction, the year has not been without stories of the better sort, Stevenson's Wier of Hermiston; Cleg Kelly, by Crockett; Mark Twain's Joan of Arc; Miss Wilkins's Madelon; Iralie's Bushranger, by Hornung; Becke's weird and vivid South Sea stories in The Ebbing of the Tide; Wandering Heath, by Quiller Couch, and others.

These are all books of the last half-year, and in addition there are the reprints, many of which bring old favorites or forgotten worthies, like Borrow in Lavengro and The Bible in Spain, back to us in cheap and convenient form. Those who are wise and provident enough to save their Congregationalists will find these, and more which we have not space to enumerate, mentioned with such praise or blame as they seem to us to have deserved, and can select according to their taste and inclination.

BOOK REVIEWS.

THE CONDUCT OF LIFE.

Is Life Worth Living? by William James, M. D. Dr. James is professor of psychology at Harvard, and delivered this address before the Young Men's Christian Association of the university. Having been in wide demand for oral delivery, it has now been reprinted from the International Journal of Ethics in a little volume of sixty-three pages, well made and convenient for the pocket.

Professor James does not approach the problem as a fully convinced Christian or use the Bible as an authoritative answer to the question of the title, but his argument comes out practically to the Christian position. He does not minimize the difficulties of the question, and he cannot see any answer to it from the side of nature. "Pessimism," he says, "is essentially a religious disease. In the form of it to which you are most liable it consists in nothing but a religious demand to which there comes no normal religious reply." In nature he finds no revelation of God. "If there be a divine Spirit of the universe, nature, such as we know her, cannot possibly be its ultimate word to man." Man, by his faith or despair, he concludes, makes his own world and decides his own destiny.

> These, then, are my last words to you: Be not afraid of life. Believe that life is worth living and your belief will help create the fact. The "scientific proof" that you are right may not be clear before the day of judgment (or some stage of being which that expression may serve to symbolize) is reached. But the faithful fighters of this hour, or the beings that then and there will represent them, may then turn to the faint hearted, who here decline to go on, with words like those with which Henry IV. greeted the tardy Crillon after a great victory had been gained: "Hang yourself, brave Crillon! we fought at Arques and you were not there."

Here is high courage and faith in God which unconsciously perhaps echoes the "Have faith in God!" of Jesus to his disciples. [Philadelphia: S. Burns Weston. 50 cents.]

Related on one side to literary criticism, by its frequent and apt illustrations taken from a wide range of reading, but more intimately on the other to the conduct of life, is Mr. Hamilton Wright Mabie's Essays on Nature and Culture. "The supreme art, to which all the arts rightly understood and used minister, is the art of living" is the opening sentence and real text of the book. In thirty brief chapters, with such suggestive titles as The Art of Arts, Education, The Race Memory, The Discovery to the Imagination, The Fundamental Correspondences, Vital Selection, The Rhythmic Movement, The Prophecy of Nature, the discoveries of the time and the gains from our larger outlook on nature are considered and spiritualized. In the best sense of the old homiletic word Mr. Mabie has taken his text from nature and given us his applications. No one can read his book thoughtfully without at once feeling the pulse of the world that beats in harmony with his own life and having his vision broadened to take in the wider life of which his own experience is but a part. To have seen life with this reverence and comprehensiveness and to have carried over the thought of it to others in such complete simplicity of expression is no slight achievement. [Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.25.]

On the Art of Living Together, by Robert F. Horton, D. D. This book, in four chapters, contains a world of kindly and often humorous wisdom upon a most important topic. Perhaps the most useful as well as original chapter is that on living together in circumstances over which we have no control, with its elucidation of the law of caution and kindness. The charm of the book is unfailing from cover to cover, and we hope it may have a wide reading and do a large work in reforming and refining our social life. [Dodd, Mead & Co. 50 cents.]

RELIGIOUS.

Prayer, Its Nature and Scope, by H. Clay Trumbull. This is a little book, but it treats a large subject with real power and suggestive illustration drawn from a wide experience of teaching and of life. Designed to meet the difficulties which many Christians feel in connection with prayer, it begins with definition and goes on to show the limitations and opportunities of the Christian in his communion with God. It makes clear that only he who has the mind of Christ can expect the event to fall out exactly according to his petition. There is wise showing up, also, of the mistakes and abuses of prayer, and the brevity of the chapters with the incisive clear cut style make easy and impressive reading. We commend the book to all Christians for instruction and encouragement. [John D. Wattles. 75 cents.]

The Fisherman and His Friends is a volume of sermons preached with gratifying results by Rev. Louis Albert Banks during a revival in Brooklyn last winter. They are brief and forcible, abounding in apt illustrations and giving instances of striking and unexpected conversions. It is not easy to get young people to read sermons, but some of these would be pretty sure to interest and help them, and the volume will be welcomed by the many who enjoyed the author's previous books. [New York: Funk & Wagnalls. $1.50.]

STORIES.

In the Valley of Tophet, by Henry W. Nevinson. Mr. Nevinson has followed his success in the slum stories of London by a book of short stories located in the "land of iron and fire—a land where nature and man seem to have combined to make a desolation and call it wealth." Dealing with those in the humblest walks of life and their friends and helpers, the book is, for the most part, concerned with tragedy. Such a story as A Vicarious Sacrifice, with its grasp of the imaginative depths of untutored human nature, marks a high literary achievement, and other tales in the book are quite as striking. On the other hand His Ewe Lamb has a strong and delightful element of humor for all the catastrophe of its ending. Mr. Nevinson's book will strengthen his hold upon the interests of the public. [Henry Holt & Co. $1.00.]

Earth's Enigmas is the well-chosen title of a volume of short stories and sketches by the Canadian writer, Charles G. D. Roberts. There is a power and originality about the book which is felt from the first, while the variety of style displayed in the stories is surprising. The Romance of an Ox-Team and The Butt of the Camp are particularly noteworthy. [Boston: Lamson, Wolffe & Co. $1.25.]

Tales of Fantasy and Fact includes some of Brander Mathews's short stories which have appeared in various periodicals. The opening tales are in quite a different style from most of this author's work, and do not always seem to us remarkably successful. The Twinkling of an Eye is a capital detective story which took a prize offered by a newspaper syndicate, while The Rival Ghosts is a most amusing conception. [New York: Harper & Brothers. $1.25.]

The tales included in The Massacre of the Innocents are selections from different Belgian writers. The opening story and one other are boldly drawn pictures of New Testament events, two deal with the mysteries just beyond our ken, while the three tales of Georges Eekhoud are realistic to a degree, thrilling and at times almost repulsive. The translator, Edith Wingate Rinder, has chosen wisely in giving her readers such a taste of Belgian literature as will awaken in them a desire for more. [Chicago: Stone & Kimball. $1.25.]

The Way They Loved at Grimpat, by E. Rentoul Esler, contains nine love stories, in most of which the heroine is wonderfully beautiful, has many lovers, and ends by marrying some one far above her in wealth or station. That the book holds the interest of the reader, in spite of the lack of variety in plot or local coloring, is a tribute to the power of the author. [New York: Henry Holt & Co. $1.00.]

In The Daughter of a Stoic, by Cornelia Atwood Pratt, the heroine loves, and is loved by, the man to whom her cousin is engaged. With the stoicism inherited from her dead mother, the beautiful girl crosses the ocean and leads the life of a student, while, through her influence, the man marries, never letting his wife suspect that his whole heart is not hers. The book is satisfactory because it represents all the characters as happy in spite of the "might have been." [New York and London: Macmillan & Co. $1.25.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Preacher's Complete Homiletical Commentary on the New Testament—The Gospel According to St. Matthew, by Rev. W. Sunderland Lewis and Rev. Henry M. Booth. Following the commentary on the Old Testament the publishers have begun a corresponding New Testament series with this volume. It is intended for the use of preachers, and contains a wealth of sermonic material from many sources. How thorough the treatment is may be judged from its purpose to include "a sermon outline or homiletic suggestion on every paragraph or verse of the New Testament that can be turned to use in the preparation of a sermon." For those preachers who can utilize this sort of material without sacrifice of originality, the book leaves little to desire. [Funk & Wagnalls Co. $3.00.]

A publication of great interest to students of the Bible and of history has been projected in the English translation of The Babylonian Talmud, by Michael L. Rodkinson, revised and corrected by Rev. Dr. Isaac M. Wise and others. The first volume contains the Tract Sabbath, with the editor's preface, a brief general introduction to the Babylonian Talmud and a special introduction to this particular tract.

We are glad to have an English translation of a book which is at once the expression of the history of an important people and the source of many of its modern customs. The task of the translator is not a light one and has, indeed, only been rendered possible by the zeal and enthusiasm of specially equipped Jewish scholars who have sifted out later accretions in the attempt to give us the text itself.

Readers will understand from this first tract why it is that so powerful and influential a book has always been reserved for the study of the few. It is a book of legal debates and judicial decisions, and is wholly without that continuity of matter which makes reading easy. These learned discussions upon points of casuistry regarding Sabbath observance also fully illustrate the care about trifles which our Lord rebuked.

We shall look with much interest to the future volumes of this translation, and can only urge upon its learned editors and translators the absolute necessity of a topical index, without which the whole will be nearly as inaccessible to the student as it was in the original. [New Amsterdam Book Co. $2.50.]

American Meditative Lyrics, by Prof. Theodore W. Hunt of Princeton University. This is a book of interpretations rather than of criticism. Its title indicates both the manner and the matter in which Professor Hunt approaches the works of our famous American poets. He has entered into the thought of the spiritual side of life and its needs, and given us a series of interesting and suggestive comments, urging upon preachers especially the study and use of the meditative poetry of the time in their appeals and sermons. The pictures in the book, portraits all of them, are atrocious. In other respects the book is a credit to author and publisher. [E. B. Treat. $1.00.]

Tales from Shakespeare, by Charles and Mary Lamb, with an introductory sketch and portraits. This is a number of the Riverside School Library, bound tastefully in half leather and beautifully printed. Children of today certainly are fortunate, if they care for reading, in having books of the quality of those which make up the Riverside Library placed within their reach at so moderate a price. [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 60 cents.]

Selections from Carlyle, edited by Henry W. Boynton, M. A., of Phillips Academy, Andover. This book is made up of three essays, together with long selections from Heroes and Hero Worship, to which brief and helpful notes are added. If young people must have their classics in bits and fragments, this seems to us an admirable selection for first acquaintance with Carlyle. [Allen & Bacon. 75 cents.]

NOTES.

—— The State Historical Society of Iowa thus far has failed to secure an autograph signature of the first governor of that State, and he was elected so recently as 1846.

—— Rev. John W. Chadwick says that for Cardinal Manning in his eulogy on Cardinal Newman to speak of his lifelong friendship for Newman was "as outrageously dishonest and untrue as would be Charles E. Dana's speaking of his lifelong friendship for Mr. Cleveland." Very true, and very pat.

—— The family of the late James Wilmarth Scoville of Chicago have done well in issuing a memorial volume. Mr. Scoville was widely known as a friend and helper of the American Board, and his benefactions to Beloit and Carleton Colleges puts his name high among those who have laid broad foundations for the future of Christian education in the West. Finely printed and illustrated, the book tells modestly but fully the story of a beneficent life.

—— Wild Westerners are not a little proud of the patronage which their libraries receive. Last year, or during the twelve months ending May 31, 1,173,586 volumes were circulated by the Public Library in pork-packing Chicago. Add to these figures the number of volumes used in the reading-room and consulted for reference and the sum total is 2,542,244. This is said to be the best showing of any circulating library in the world. The library has now on its shelves 217,203 bound volumes and is increasing, perhaps, ten thousand volumes a year. It will soon be in its new building, where its patronage will certainly be far greater than at present.

Certainly Browning did not pose as a poet, or as anything in particular. He was well washed, well dressed, well brushed and talked well and sometimes amusingly. This particular night he was singularly brilliant. He discussed poetry, ancient and modern, British and foreign; and I remember that he expressed a poor opinion of John Bright's critical judgments on poetry. From poetry he passed on to painting, then to the doctrine of evolution, and then to Plato's Phaedo as an argument for immortality, to his Republic as a study in politics, and to his Dialogues in general as superb exhibitions of literary style. One of the guests having made a move toward the door, Browning looked at his watch, and, finding that it was past two o'clock in the morning, he proposed that we should make a real Greek symposium of it and continue the dialogue until breakfast.

MINISTERIAL RELIEF.—In order to afford a little timely aid to aged and disabled home and foreign missionaries and ministers and their families, the committee of the National Council asks from each church one splendid offering for its permanent invested fund. It also invites generous individual gifts. For fuller information see Minutes of National Council, 1892, and Year-Book, 1893, page 62. Secretary, Rev. N. H. Whittlesey, New Haven, Ct.; Treasurer, Rev. S. B. Forbes, Hartford, Ct. Form of a bequest: I bequeath to the "Trustees of the National Council of the Congregational Churches of the United States" (a body corporate chartered under the laws of the State of Connecticut) [here insert the bequest], to be used for the purpose of Ministerial Relief, as provided in the resolution of the National Council of the Congregational Churches of the United States at its session held in Chicago in October, 1886.

THE CONGREGATIONAL BOARD OF PASTORAL SUPPLY, established by the Massachusetts General Association, offers its services to churches desiring pastors or pulpit supplies. Careful attention is given to applications from without the State. Room 22A, Congregational House, Boston. Rev. Charles B. Rice, Sec.

Send clothing, comfort bags, reading, etc., to Capt. S. S. Nickerson, chaplain, 287 Hanover St. Bequests should read: "I give and bequeath to the Boston Seaman's Friend Society the sum of $——, to be applied to the charitable uses and purposes of said society." Rev. Alexander McKenzie, D. D., President; George Gould, Treasurer.

PASSING COMMENT.

Quite a sizable increase of Georgia Congregationalism is registered this week. We trust these dozen or more churches will find their new ecclesiastical relations congenial and conducive to their growth.

The absence of sensational or ultra-emotional features in the revival from which sprang the new Massachusetts church chronicled this week is shown by the fact that, contrary to the usual order, adults were the first to be impressed and to enter the Christian life, while the children and youth came later.

It is rarely indeed that such a family reunion of churches takes place as occurred recently in Maine, when four generations were represented—the mother church, the entertaining church, its daughter and granddaughter. May such examples of fruitfulness and harmony multiply.

Our firm belief that an essential part of the minister's church year is a generous vacation, the omission of which is as detrimental to the best interests of the church as to those of its leader, does not blind us to the noble self-sacrifice which in special cases impels a pastor to stay by his flock from a conviction that in just that place and at just that time the need is one which he alone can meet.

The successful launching of a new church enterprise in a field particularly unpromising save for the petitions of two aged saints is a fresh evidence that God never fails to hear the prayers of his trusting children and that, though the answer may tarry, it is sure to come in his own good way and time.

Many churches are very properly adapting the number and length of their services to suit the heated term. In some cases the evening meeting is held in the early twilight, dispensing with the heat and glare of artificial lights. The best possible place for such a service is in the open air. A moderate number of brief sessions, attended in a spirit of cheerful gratitude and with a hearty purpose to contribute generously toward their success, cannot fail to yield rich blessings.

The spiritual harvest reaped at an after meeting following the dedication of that house of worship in Oregon ought to lead other churches to adopt this novel idea.

The embarrassment experienced by that Springfield church in disposing of individual communion cups after using them must have been felt by other churches as well. Why not have a youthful Samuel follow each deacon with a second tray for collecting the empty cups? Even if the dealers are accustomed to furnish only one tray with each set of cups, surely they could be induced to provide extra ones should the demand become general. The expedient of receptacles fastened to the pew in front has been proved satisfactory.

JOY ON THE HILLTOP.

With greater numbers, but not with keener joy or deeper gratitude, did the old saints on their way to the yearly feast at Jerusalem chant their trustful "song for the goings up"—I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills—when first the distant mountains disclosed themselves to their expectant vision, than did the modest company gathered in Mont Vernon, N. H., on Tuesday, July 7, as with simple ceremony they dedicated to the worship of God their beautiful new church, which crowns the hilltop from which the ancient town takes its name. The day was gray, but the spirit of the assembled company, a company which tested the capacity of the new temple, was impervious to the weather. The bell in the tower of the old church across the way, in which for nearly a century and a quarter—since 1780—"prayer was wont to be made," rang out a requiem for the old and a welcome for the new, and, obedient to its call, at one o'clock friends, guests, neighbors, members gathered in the dainty structure for the anticipated services of dedication.

The church edifice, made possible by the generous gift of $5,000 from the daughters of the late Calvin Stevens, supplemented by others from friends interested in Mont Vernon, residents of the town, church members, and especially the brave ladies of the Home Circle, is constructed of field stone to the hight of the window-sills, is in design of the picturesque colonial, with details of the Renaissance, and is in every way thoroughly appointed and equipped for its intended uses. The beautiful memorial windows bear the names of honored saints, whose noble memories cannot fail to inspire the coming generations.

For more than a century this church has been doing its quiet but efficient work; for more than a century it has been sending out into the great world lives in which it has deposited the formative influence which has controlled and ennobled them. Distant States have felt its influence and remote communities its power. There were present at these services four brothers, one a beloved and honored deacon in this church, the other three serving in the same capacity in other churches; on the building committee were two gentlemen, not residents of Mont Vernon, who in their respective homes exert wide influences, whose source they are glad to trace to this historic church.

The representative company gathered from a wide area, and inclusive of many callings was itself an empathic testimony to the character of the influence upon pulpit, press, politics, education and commerce which this church is today exerting. Surely the country churches are the salt of our ecclesiastical Zions!

The services of dedication were simple. The prayer by Rev. Warren R. Cochrane, D. D., for thirty years pastor at Antrim and bishop of all the surrounding country, was of singular appropriateness and pathos, while the hymns for the occasion were written by Mr. H. Porter Smith of Cambridge, Mass., son of a former much loved minister of the church, and Deacon W. H. Conant. The sermon was by Rev. N. Boynton, D. D. In the evening at a general service of reminiscence and joy, presided over by George A. Marden, Esq., of Lowell, the sum of $1,000 was raised and thus the church left upon its dedication day free of debt. The energetic and faithful pastor, Rev. T. J. Lewis, with a commodious and exquisite building, a loyal church and a host of interested friends, is now prepared to minister, as never before, to this community with its one, but sufficient, church. The church itself has surely renewed its youth, and, as it fronts its task again, finds its privilege and duty finely expressed in Deacon Conant's dedication hymn:

Stand on this hilltop then,
Thou witness unto men,
In his dear name.
Sound out o'er hill and plain—
God's love and truth remain,
Christ and his cross are gain—
Ever the same.

A LONG AND FAITHFUL MAINE PASTORATE.

The thirtieth anniversary of Dr. William H. Fenn's pastorate over the High Street Church, Portland, was celebrated July 5. At the morning service Dr. Fenn preached upon a pastor's joy in his people. The sacramental service in the afternoon was one of affectionate reminiscense and tender feeling. An immense congregation in the evening brought together representatives of all the churches, many pastors giving up their services in honor of the occasion. The music was by a triple quartet, accompanied by an orchestra. Eight pastors representing five denominations participated in the services. Beginning with the latest arrival and ending with the pastor longest in Portland, Dr. Fenn invited six brother clergymen to make addresses. Rev. Dr. Parsons, pastor of the Chestnut Street M. E. Church, spoke of the growing fellowship of the denominations; Rev. R. T. Hack brought greetings from the Second Parish Church, the mother of High Street, and paid an eloquent tribute to the eminent gifts of the pastor's wife; Rev. Dr. J. L. Jenkins, in behalf of State Street, the daughter of High Street, emphasized the value of long pastorates and the qualities that make a thirty years' pastorate possible; Rev. D. M. Pratt, representing Williston Church, the granddaughter of High Street, spoke of the privileges of the minister; Rev. A. H.

Wright, for twenty-five years pastor of St. Lawrence Street Church, referred gratefully to his personal indebtedness to Dr. Fenn during a quarter of a century of intimate acquaintance; Dr. Asa Dalton, for forty years the pastor of St. Stephen's Episcopal Church, in the most catholic spirit dwelt upon the changes that had taken place in Portland in the last twenty-five years, and of the growth of fraternal sympathy and toleration so characteristic of these later days.

Dr. Fenn replied feelingly to the affectionate words of his brethren. Few men after so long a ministry are so youthful in spirit, so alert physically and so energetic and vivacious in public address as this honored pastor. His vigor gives promise of another decade of service in a pastorate which, with one exception, is now the longest in the State. Deacon William Marks and wife held a notable reception at their residence, July 8, in honor of Dr. and Mrs. Fenn, inviting representative people of the city and churches.

THE STORY OF MOORE'S CORNER.

If you look at the record of churches formed, in this paper, you will find, "Moore's Corner, July 8, 27 members." The story back of that announcement is worth telling. Moore's Corner is in the northern part of the town of Leverett, in Massachusetts. There are, in the school district, some forty families—150 people. It has been considered a sort of Hardscrabble, with no church-going people, no religious service of any kind, not much of any Sunday in the neighborhood.

Less than a year ago Rev. S. P. Cook, who was employed by the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society to superintend certain evangelistic work to be done in Franklin County, sent two young men, Messrs. Anderson and Wightman, to hold religious services at Moore's Corner. They went, but met with little encouragement. It was with great difficulty that they found any one willing to take them into their homes. The meetings began with only five or six attending them, but the young men, who were from the Moody school at Mt. Hermon, simply held on. With no flourish of trumpets, no effort to raise an excitement, they preached the gospel and opened the Bible to those who came. After a litt'e the meetings increased in number and power, men and women were converted, and at last they wished to organize a church.

At the council held for this purpose, twenty-six men and women, young and old, gave, in the examination, most interesting accounts of their religious experience. They told how their homes had changed and how the whole community was made over by the power of the truth. The first conversions were among the parents and afterward younger ones came out as Christians. The quietness and peacefulness of the movement has been remarkable. The interest in religious things has by no means culminated, and others will soon unite with the new church.

There are two Christian women at Moore's Corner who have been praying for years that there might be a change in the hearts and lives of the people there.

A JUBILEE OVER THE BORDER.

On the breezy summit of Keswick Ridge, N. B., fourteen miles from Fredericton, gathered, July 2-6, the Congregational hosts of eastern Canada for the fiftieth anniversary of their united existence. The meetings were of unusual enthusiasm, and although a hard rain on Sunday interfered with the "big meeting," to which the whole country side are wont to repair, all thanked God for its timely influence upon the harvest. On Thursday the denominational interests came to the front, the benevolent societies reported and the Union of Ontario was heard from. The spirit of fraternity was in the air and the action of the Ontario brethren looking toward affiliation with those of the States was greeted with applause. The retiring chairman, Rev. D. W. Purdon, gave a masterly address upon The Relation of Congregationalism to Christ's Crown Rights to Save and Rule. Friday was missionary day. The women met in the early morning to pray, and in the afternoon occurred their missionary anniversary. A well-prepared program interested all. In the evening Mrs. A. Jenkins, their president, Rev. E. C. Wall, late of Newfoundland, and Rev. A. Braine dealt with phases of the missionary problem.

Saturday was jubilee day. The papers of reminiscence pictured forth early days of privation and obstacle, and called forth expressions of thanksgiving for the present. An evangelistic service in the evening was immediately fruitful in souls seeking Christ. The union sermon was preached by Rev. Dr. W. B. Forbush of Yarmouth on The Help of Good People. As the clouds lifted people began to gather and during Sunday afternoon and evening the church was crowded with people from miles around. Lively discussions arose over the financial relation of the churches to those of the stronger Ontario Union and over the denominational paper, but all was settled harmoniously, and the spirit of prayer and of progress was evident throughout.

The reports of the churches showed ripeness for harvest, and while honored pastors are leaving others are pressing in. Rev. W. J. Minchin of St. John is a new and strong addition to the forces. The articles on Canadian Congregationalism in the Boston Congregationalist were warmly praised. The chairman for 1896-7 is Rev. W. B. Forbush. The next union will be held at Milton, N. S.

CONFERENCES AND ASSOCIATIONS.

N. D.—Grand Forks Conference held its second annual meeting at Lakota, June 16, 17, presenting an excellent program. It was a meeting of rare spiritual interest. All the churches were represented, ten members of the church at Inkster driving over forty miles to attend. Rev. C. A. Mack preached the sermon. Among topics discussed were: Character as Related to Usefulness, Do Our Methods of Work for the Young Need Changing? Looking Forward, Home Missions and the Sunday School. Strong resolutions indorsing Fargo College were adopted.

Wahpeton Conference met at Forman, June 30, July 1. An excellent report of the National Council was given by the conference delegate, Judge O. J. Wakefield. The sermon by Rev. D. T. Jenkins was strong and helpful. Rev. William Edwards read a paper on The Service of God and the Promises. Fargo College and the missionary societies were represented, the conference indorsing the college and its work by strong resolutions. The ladies' missionary meeting was a special feature. The closing evening was devoted to good citizenship.

All the conferences in the State have shown a deep interest in the work of Fargo College, and have pledged to its officers, faculty and trustees their loyal co-operation in its upbuilding.

ME.—Kennebec Conference met at S. Gardiner, Rev. S. E. McGeehon preaching the sermon. Topics were: What Can the Churches Do for the Conference and What the Conference for the Churches? What Have the People a Right to Expect of Their Minister and the Pastor of His People? Aids to Christian Living—the Bible, the Holy Spirit, Church Services. The subject Responsibility was treated in three parts—What God Has Done for Man, What Shall I Do To Be Saved? What Shall I Do with My Christian Life? A paper on Armenia was read at the women's meeting, beside the usual program.

Waldo Conference meeting at Searsport opened with a report of the county missionary work. The proceedings and result of the Madison, Ct., heresy trial were considered. Among the topics were: How Can the Local Church Increase Its Hold on the Community? What Is the Best Thing Your Church Has to Report for the Past Year? What Does Waldo Conference Owe to Bangor Seminary? Secretaries Hood and Daniels presented the work of the C. C. B. S. and the A. B. C. F. M. The report on the state of the churches was excellent.

CLUBS.

WN.—The Puget Sound Club held its summer session, July 1, upon the grounds of the Puget Sound Chautauqua Assembly, the banquet being spread in the dining hall of the assembly's hotel. Large delegations were present from Olympia, Tacoma, Seattle and Snohomish. Rev. Clarence L. Diven, D. D., Ph. D., of Olympia, made an address on Current Discussions in Religion and Sociology. The club had also for its guest Rev. Carlos Martyn, D. D., of Chicago, who gave a brief address on Civil Service in the Municipality.

N. H.—Pascataqua Club celebrated its field day July 2 at Hotel Wentworth, Portsmouth. Dr. Trueblood, in an impressive address on The Abolition of War, spoke encouragingly of the rapid progress of the peace movement. The greetings of Central Club were brought by its president, Hon. L. D. Stevens.

NEW ENGLAND.

Massachusetts.

BOSTON.—Park St. Rev. J. L. Withrow, D. D., a former pastor, preached a striking sermon last Sunday morning from the text, "If any man serve me, him will my Father honor." He drew his illustrations from both sacred and profane history, and cited as cause for congratulation the facts that no infidel has ever occupied our presidential chair and that both the present candidates are God-fearing men.

SOMERVILLE.—Highland. The pastor, Rev. G. S. Anderson, thinking that the work requires his presence, has decided to take no regular vacation, but merely to "slow up" a little during the summer months.

MELROSE.—The recent dismissal by council of Rev. A. G. Bale terminates a pastorate of 27 years marked by industry and fidelity and crowned with fruit of many kinds. Mr. Bale came here directly from Andover Seminary and in length of service few pastors in the State outrank him. He has proved useful to the denomination in many important capacities, acting for many years as registrar of the State Association. The dismissing council put on record its appreciation of his rare qualities as a pastor and a man.

CLIFTONDALE.—First. The pastor, Rev. W. S. Thompson, will take his vacation in August, dividing his time between Fairhaven and Marshfield, Mass. During his absence the congregation will unite with the Methodist and Baptist churches, and the Sunday school and C. E. Society will hold their regular services.

LOWELL.—First. The controversy still drags its wearisome length along The minority took the precaution to enter a protest with the State commissioner of corporations against granting the incorporation proposed by the majority, but as the commissioner has no judicial authority the request for a charter, when subsequently presented, could not be refused and was at once issued, the name of First Trinitarian Congregational Church being used to prevent confusion. The members of the opposite party, at the meeting called to consider the question of incorporation, filed a protest declaring that they would not regard themselves members of such an incorporation. They also claimed that those who had formed this new corporation—many of whom have been worshiping in Mechanics Hall, where services have been conducted by Rev. G. F. Kenngott, who had been formally chosen pastor of the Trinitarian Church—had thereby withdrawn from the old church and called a church meeting to fill the offices made vacant by these asserted withdrawals. This meeting, attended only by their adherents, elected six deacons and other officers, asserting themselves to be the First Congregational Church, which was the old title. The individuals to whom the church building was leased by the society at once recognized their claim, and served notice upon the former officials that they would not be allowed to officiate in that house in their former capacity. These officers filed written protests against their exclusion, but submitted to the authority of those who have the lease of the building. A committee of the Trinitarian Church has since then met certain of the lessees to discuss property questions, and the discussion is reported to have been of a kindly character, from which it is to be hoped some amicable settlement will be obtained. The records are still in the possession of the body incorporated as the First Trinitarian Congregational Church, as well as the communion service, which they kindly "loaned" to their opponents for the service of July 5.

TEWKSBURY.—Over 100 applications for the pastorate have been received by the committee since the resignation of Rev. James Alexander in May. The population of the town is 2,515.

FALL RIVER.—First and Central are to hold united services during the summer, each edifice to be occupied three Sundays. Vacation supplies will be as follows: July 26, Rev. Daniel Merriman, D.D.; Aug. 2, Rev. F. B. Pullan; 9, Rev. T. P. Prudden, D.D.; 16, Rev. E. S. Tead; 23, Rev. W. E. Barton, D.D.; 30, Rev. M. Burnham, D.D.

WORCESTER.—Park. The Woman's Christian Service League held its semi-annual meeting July 3. The members have made 500 calls, have held cottage prayer meetings in different sections of the parish, a missionary meeting at the church and have made a special point to greet strangers at the church services.——Plymouth. Dr. Archibald McCullagh, with two daughters, is spending his vacation in Europe. The pulpit supplies are: July 5, 26, Dr. E. B. Webb; 12, Rev. C. H. Jones; 19, Dr. S. S. Mitchell; Aug. 2, Dr. Charles Wadsworth; Sept. 6, Rev. A. McCullagh, Jr. The church will be closed four Sundays in August.——Central. Dr. Daniel Merriman is at his summer home, Intervale, N. H. Rev. E. M. Chapman will be at home through the summer and all the church services will be continued.——Old South. Dr. A. Z. Conrad will be absent the last of July and all of August, spending the time at Narragansett Pier, Mohonk and the Adirondacks. He will supply Dr. P. S. Moxom's pulpit, Springfield, one Sunday in August. The church will join in union services with the Main Street (Baptist) church a part of the time, and Rev. F. B. Makepeace and Dr. Nehemiah Boynton are among the supplies.——Piedmont. Dr. Elijah Horr spends his vacation at his summer home among the Thousand Isles. The house of worship will be closed two months for extensive repairs, during which time the congregation will worship with Pilgrim Church.——Pilgrim. Dr. and Mrs. Alex. Lewis spend their vacation in Europe. Dr. S. H. Virgin of New York city occupied the pulpit last Sunday; Rev. F. L. Goodspeed of Springfield will supply July 26, and Dr. Eldridge Mix July 19 and the entire month of August.——Belmont has granted its pastor July in addition to August for vacation in the hope that he may regain his health. The supplies are: July 12, Rev. A. H. Coolidge and Rev. J. H. Roberts, the latter having just returned from China; 19, Dr. A. E. P. Perkins and Mr. Berry; 26, Rev. R. M. Taft.——Hope. Rev. E. W. Phillips will attend the conference at Northfield and spend the remainder of August in New Hampshire. Supplies: Aug. 2 and 9, Rev. R. M. Taft; 16, Dr. George H. Gould; 23, Rev. H. L. Hastings.

SPENCER.—First. This church and congregation feel deeply the loss by death of the organist, Mr. Alfred R. Hallett, who had served them faithfully for 12 years. The Sunday following his death, out of respect to his memory, the large organ was hushed and heavily draped in black with a floral design in the center, while the choir sat with the audience. The Sunday services were all appropriate to this sad event.

SPRINGFIELD.—First. The communion service this month demonstrated anew the fact that some method must be secured to dispose of the individual communion cups after they have been drained. By the system now used the deacons pass the cups, which are returned immediately to the tray. The carrying of full and empty cups on the same tray causes some confusion, and in several instances persons have taken empty cups in mistake for full ones. This is embarrassing alike to the deacons and communicants. Unable to settle the question satisfactorily, the committee of the church have empowered the pastor, Rev. F. L. Goodspeed, and ex-Lieut.-Gov. William H. Haile to devise and adopt some feasible plan. The church is still in the midst of repairs. The new ceiling is in place and general improvements are now being made throughout the building. The evening services have been discontinued for the summer.——South. Dr. P. S. Moxom is spending his vacation in England and on the Continent. The pulpit was supplied last Sunday by Dr. J. S. Riggs of Auburn Seminary. Only the morning preaching service is held during July.——Park. The women are to be commended for their efforts in raising the debt of the church. Some time ago they pledged $1,000 for this purpose, and by hard and constant work have succeeded in raising that amount, the last payment having been recently made. There is still some money in the treasury.——Hope. Rev. L. F. Giroux of the French-American College occupied the pulpit last Sunday, Rev. R. W. Brokaw, the pastor, being in Washington at the convention of the C. E. Society, of which he is a trustee. The Boys' Brigade recently enjoyed a camp outing at East Otis, thus further carrying out the idea of the organization.

Maine.

CASTINE.—The centennial of the town was celebrated July 9 with great festivities. The literary exercises were held in the Congregational church, which has recently been extensively repaired and refurnished and has a beautiful interior. Noah Brooks, Esq., presided. The pastor, Rev. J. P. Cushman, led in prayer. An historical address, original hymn, music by the Belfast band and two poems, one written by Mrs. Sandford B. Dole, a native of the place, now wife of the president of the Hawaiian republic, were the chief features of this part of the celebration.

PORTLAND.—Williston. The pastor, Rev. D. M. Pratt, has been granted two weeks' extra vacation. His pulpit will be supplied through July and August by Rev. G. D. Lindsay of Portland, Rev. F. E. Clark, D. D., Rev. Dr. Pleasant Hunter and Rev. M. S. Hughes, both of Minneapolis, and by Rev. E. B. Webb, D.D.——State Street. Rev. Dr. J. L. Jenkins will remain at his post through the summer.

BANGOR.—Hammond Street held an interesting A. M. A. meeting, at which the various departments of the society's work were presented. This church has enjoyed the singing of two members of the Boston Temple Quartet at the morning and evening services.

ELLSWORTH FALLS.—As the hall occupied by this church is not adapted to the needs of the growing congregation, the sum of $2,000 has been pledged to build a meeting house in the near future.

SCARBORO.—The A. M. A. party, under Rev. G. W. Moore, held an effective service. Mrs. Moore's singing, as well as the other exercises, were heartily enjoyed.

DENMARK.—The 36 brave women who formed the church here a year ago rejoice in the addition of 12 new members, four of whom are men.

A recent accession of eight members at Waterville makes 39 received since Jan. 1.——Rev. J. C. Young, who recently resigned at Fryeburg, is supplying at Brownfield and Chatham.——The church building at N. Bridgton is to be extensively repaired.——The Welsh people at Monson enjoyed a service in their native tongue last Sunday.——Repairs on the meeting house in Patten are in progress.——Rev. Arthur Shirley of Old Lyme, Ct., is engaged to supply at Bethel during August.

Oxford County is greatly blessed in its faithful and beloved missionary, Rev. S. S. York, whose presence in the homes is not the least valuable part of his work. He has been urging the home study of the Bible and has 500 pledges of half an hour a day devoted to the Sunday school lesson.

New Hampshire.

PEMBROKE.—The pastor, Rev. P. E. Bourne, besides attending to the regular services at his own church, has held during the past year bi-monthly meetings at Pembroke Hill, and recently once a month at Buck Street. Some of his parishioners in turn have volunteered a conveyance, thus aiding him in work otherwise impracticable. By his energetic labors he has endeared himself greatly to his people. He is now taking a well-earned vacation at Old Orchard beach.

NEWINGTON.—This church has adopted the weekly offering system and has become self-supporting.

Thirty three persons united with the church in Milford during the past year, 14 on confession, their ages ranging from 12 to 86.——After doing service for 72 years the shingles on the roof of the Canterbury church have been renewed.

Rhode Island.

SMITHFIELD AND TARKILN.—These two home missionary fields near Slatersville, in the northwestern part of the State, have been opened up by Rev. E. N. Billings, who is now at work there.

Connecticut.

ESSEX.—The sextons in the Congregational and Methodist churches had a rather novel experience July 5. When they attempted to ring the call to service, no sound came forth, as the tongues to the bells had been removed by the church watchman the night before the Fourth and hidden away. The sextons admitted that there was something uncanny in the failure of the bells to respond.

IVORYTON.—Rev. L. S. Griggs returned home last week after a two months' vacation, much improved in health. During his absence the local pulpit was filled by pastors who are fellow-members of the local association.

NEW HAVEN—Rev. Dr. T. T. Munger of the United Church sailed for Europe last Saturday for a two months' visit. During the next six weeks union services will be held in the Center and United Churches.

WINSTED.—Most of the churches a week ago Sunday devoted their evening services to exercises of a patriotic order. At the Second Church, Rev. J. S. Voorhees spoke in condemnation of the A. P. A.

EAST HADDAM.—Rev. Francis Parker entertained the members of his parish July 4 at a lawn party on the parsonage grounds. In the evening a fine display of fireworks took place.

At the union meeting in Plainville a week ago Sunday in behalf of the Armenian cause about $64 were raised towards the fund for their relief.——Extensive repairs are being made on the parsonage in Newtown, including an entire new roof on the west side of the house.

MIDDLE STATES.

New York.

CORTLAND.—The first Sunday in July was a day of rejoicing, for on that day was celebrated the wiping out of the mortgage of $6,000. This heavy burden has been borne for a long time and it is only with great effort and sacrifice, in these hard times, that the church, under the leadership of its pastor, Rev. W. H. Pound, was able to reach this gratifying result. Addresses were made at the morning service by the pastor and officers of the church, after which the Lord's supper was celebrated and eight persons received to membership.

BROOKLYN.—Lee Ave. Rev. J. Brittan Clark, for five years the beloved and successful pastor, whose recent serious bicycle accident has caused deep anxiety to his friends and parishioners, is improving daily and his more favorable symptoms encourage hope that he may recover and resume work in the autumn.

A summer singing class has been organized in the church at Sidney by Prof. G. S. Kittredge.

New Jersey.

GLEN RIDGE.—The Children's Day exercises—belated owing to storm—were this year of a patriotic character, celebrating the 119th anniversary of the adoption of the American flag. An address was made by Mr. A. E. Marling of New York on Patriotism plus Religion. A barrel of goods was recently sent by the Ladies' Aid Society to a missionary in Oklahoma whose salary last year was $300. The King's Daughters, jointly with similar circles in Bloomfield, maintains a kindergarten for the poor. The Ladies' Foreign Missionary Society has devoted its sessions this past year to the study of Turkey and maintains a Bible woman at Cæsarea.

WESTFIELD—A parish newspaper, entitled The Church Clippings, has been established. It is a neat, four-page sheet with advertisements. A men's class in the Sunday school has been formed, taught by the pastor. All departments were much gratified recently by a visit from the late pastor, Rev. C. H. Patton, now of Duluth. The church has asked the Endeavor Society to take charge of the regular prayer meeting during July and August.

NEWARK.—Bethlehem. The church is doing well spiritually, and at last is making progress in temporal affairs. A suitable house of worship has been secured, and $1,100 paid upon it. The Y. P. S. C. E. has sent the pastor, his wife and two other delegates to the Washington convention.

VINELAND.—During June the pastor gave a course of Sunday evening discourses, illustrated with the stereopticon, entitled Sermons in Candles, using about a dozen pictures each time. Much interest was manifested.

Pennsylvania.

PHILADELPHIA.—Kensington. The new chapel of this year old church was dedicated June 28. It has been built without calling upon the Church Building Society, the people providing the lot and a friend presenting them with a pleasant and commodious chapel costing $1,500. Rev. E. F. Fales offered the prayer of dedication, and addresses were made by Rev. E. W. Rice, D. D., Mrs. E. F. Fales, teacher of the primary department, Rev. C. H. Richards and the pastor, Rev. N. N. Bormose.

THE SOUTH.

Georgia.

WADLEY.—A Congregational council was held near this point June 27, to fellowship 14 new churches which had come out from Methodism and organized as a Christian body, with Rev. J. A. Murphy as president. Hearing afterward about Congregationalism, each church sent representatives to this council. Rev. J. B. Fletcher was chosen moderator and Rev. J. H. H. Sengstacke scribe. It was unanimously voted to receive these churches into Congregational fellowship. Many had journeyed for miles to attend the first Congregational meeting in this part of the country.

THE INTERIOR.

Ohio.

THOMPSON.—A somewhat new departure in commemorating Independence Day was witnessed by a large gathering from all directions on Thompson hill, famous for its ledge of conglomerate, to attend a meeting conducted by Evangelist Reed, with his singer, Mr. Chafer. It was an all-day picnic, physically and spiritually refreshing.

THE WEST.

Missouri.

ST. LOUIS.—First. Rev. W. W. Willard has been engaged to supply during the vacation of the pastor, Rev. J. H. George, D. D. Mr. Willard will remain upon the field during the week and carry on the pastoral work.——Compton Hill. Dr. G. C. Adams goes East for the summer. The pulpit will be supplied by Rev. Messrs. Robert Nourse, R. C. Dennison and J. W. Sutherland, D. D.——Hyde Park. In connection with its new building this church has just passed through a severe financial struggle. The indebtedness has not been canceled, but it is now so placed that it can be carried without anxiety. This church has the largest Boys' Brigade in the city, under the captain of St. Louis's finest militia company. There are about 75 members.——Central. Rev. C. S. Sargent will go East for his vacation. The church will be closed during August. It also has a fine Boys' Brigade under an efficient captain.——Union. Since Rev. H. L. Forbes left the field Supt. A. L. Love, in addition to his other duties, has been acting as pastor of this church.

Iowa.

TRAER.—The church celebrated, June 22, the 40th anniversary of its organization, which took place in a log house with seven members. It was first christened Twelve Mile Creek church, later the name was changed to Buckingham and then to Traer. Rev. O. O. Smith, the present pastor, is the ninth in succession. Since his coming last September the church has received 105 new members. Toward the erection of its present house of worship Governor Buckingham of Massachusetts contributed $2,000, and the Home Missionary Society aided to the amount of $2,250, $2,000 of which has been repaid since the church came to self-support. From first to last 543 members have been received, the present membership being 280.

CEDAR RAPIDS.—First. Rev. G. R. Dickinson closed his pastorate, June 28. In the evening the various churches united in a farewell service held in the St. Paul's M. E. Church. Remarks were made by various pastors expressing appreciation of Mr. Dickinson's work and of regret at his departure. In the afternoon he spoke before a large audience at the meeting of the Gospel Temperance Society, of which he has been an active member and the vice-president. The society passed resolutions of regret at his departure.

VICTOR.—The prayer meetings are encouraging as to attendance and interest. The Sunday school has outgrown its accommodations so that the young peoples' Bible class is obliged to meet in the parsonage. Rev. W. B. Payne is the pastor.

AURELIA.—Rev. B. L. Webber and family have recently moved into a newly purchased parsonage, which proves to be one of the most desirable homes in the town. A number of persons in this vicinity are about to organize a branch church.

MOORELAND.—Mr. W. D. King and family are now comfortably settled in the new parsonage, which contains five rooms and a garret. The building cost $500 and is all paid for except $50.

Dr. A. L. Frisbie of Plymouth Church, Des Moines, will spend his vacation on the coast of Maine, near Portland.

Minnesota.

MINNEAPOLIS.—Union. Some embarrassing debts have been paid, and with a little help from the H. M. S. and a grant of $500 from the C. C. B. S., the church, under Rev. William Hardcastle, stands free of financial encumbrance. The pastor is making a trip to the East.——Lyndale is still working upon its debt, keeps up its benevolences and is making progress along spiritual lines. The pastor, Rev. L. H. Keller, spends his vacation in Minnesota. The former pastor, Rev. A. Hadden, during whose term of service the church building was erected, is spending his vacation in the city and supplies his old pulpit for two Sundays.——Fremont Avenue. Rev. James McAllister supplies at Glenwood during his vacation.

DULUTH.—Morley. A new church building advantageously located, to be dedicated in August, a substantial reduction of the home missionary appropriation, with a bright outlook for the future under Rev. W. W. Newell, are reported.——Mayflower is suffering from the financial stringency, some neighboring churches, however, being closed. An earnest struggle under Evangelist J. I. Sanford is being made to keep Congregational forces together. No great growth is expected until financial conditions change.—— Plymouth. The church is closed for the present, Sunday school and prayer meetings being sustained by a faithful few.

ALEXANDRIA.—Rev. G. F. Morton, who is in charge of the circuit work, preaches at five points and is looking up two others. Much interest has been developed in the various neighborhoods, Sunday schools have been opened and finance committees appointed. Some conversions have occurred. At one point a baseball club killed the Sunday school last year, but this year the preaching service wins. Men formerly considered as infidels are assisting.

FARIBAULT.—A patriotic service was held on the evening of July 5, the pastor speaking on The Duty of Christianizing America, and the local post of the G. A. R. attending in a body. The audience-room was beautifully decorated with flags and the music was inspiring. The pastor, Rev. G. S. Ricker, postpones his vacation till after the meeting of the State association, to be held in Faribault Sept. 15-18.

ST. PAUL.—Olivet. An open air service, in which all denominations unite and the pastors and laymen speak, takes the place of the Sunday evening service, being held at five o'clock. The attendance is large and interested. Each pastor is responsible for the service for one month. The women have paid for the annex to the church building and the little church has been greatly strengthened.

MORRIS.—Under the lead of Rev. A. H. Tebbets the church is making decided advance. A pipe organ has been secured and the church has just voted to procure new windows and carpet, to rearrange the seats and to secure, if possible, new heating apparatus. The money is being raised. Outside work is being cared for by the pastor, several promising out-stations being served.

BRAINERD.—Second. The little church is crowded to its utmost capacity since the coming of the new pastor, people staying away on account of lack of room. A midweek meeting devoted to Bible study half fills the auditorium. Several new familes have identified themselves with the congregation and the great question is to secure ampler accommodations.

NEW YORK MILLS.—This church, organized a few months ago, worships in a Lutheran church building. The pastor has a region 28 miles square under his care and plans to hold a Bible study meeting, as he is able, with every family under his care. Sunday schools, at each of which a preaching service is held, have been opened at several points.

CLEARWATER.—During the year's pastorate of Rev. J. L. Jones finances have been brought into better shape. A few additions to the church, increased growth of the C. E. Society and a better spiritual life, with improvement at the out-station Hasty, are reported. Mr. Jones has been asked to remain another year.

WINONA.—Second. This church is making slow progress in increasing the congregations and Sunday school and has a hopeful spirit notwithstanding some indifference in the community. It has not had a resident pastor for nearly a year until the coming of Rev. W. L. Dibble.

RANDALL.—A meeting house has been built, the pastor, a student from Carleton College, acting as chairman of the building committee and financial agent. With help from the C. C. B. S. all bills will be paid. Mr. W. R. McClane returns to college in the autumn.

FERTILE.—An out-station has been opened at Beltrami, where a congregation and a Sunday school have been gathered by Rev. A. E. Barnes. The only discouraging feature is the poor outlook for harvest on account of wet weather.

Rev. Messrs. F. A. Sumner of Glenwood, D. W. Cram of Staples, William Hardcastle of Minneapolis are spending their vacation at the East.

Kansas.

BROOKVILLE.—The house of worship has been repaired and papered, also new singing-books have been purchased for use in the Sunday school and prayer meeting.

North Dakota.

HILLSBORO.—Rev. N. P. McQuarrie has decided to enter upon the work of an evangelist. He has issued a circular setting forth his plans and will begin his new work about Sept. 1. Mr. McQuarrie has been a most excellent pastor, is a man of rare spiritual power, with a deep love for souls, and will certainly be a safe evangelist and one whose methods will be acceptable to pastors. Churches securing him for such work will make no mistake.

KENSAL.—Rev. J. L. Martin accepts work here and at Wimbledon and Courtenay, beginning at once. This is the field that has been supplied for two years by Rev. W. R. Whidden.

The church at Fessenden has completed its edifice and expects to dedicate it soon.

PACIFIC COAST.

Oregon.

PORTLAND.—First is still without a pastor, though all services have been regularly held and the appointments well attended. The Sunday school is constantly improving.——Hassalo Street. Aggressive work is being done and the influence of the church is constantly widening.——Mississippi Avenue. All departments are flourishing. The Sunday school never was so large. The house to house canvas has awakened great interest and resulted in accessions, some of them from Catholicism.——Sunnyside. The Boys' Brigade is a prominent factor of the work in this church, and the effect is being narrowly watched by sister churches, some of whom have no faith in the ultimate value of the movement. So far in this church more has been accomplished than the most sanguine have expected.

EUGENE.—This church is harmonious and out of debt. The audience-room is being repapered, reseated and otherwise brightened in anticipation of the coming, Aug. 1, of the new pastor, Rev. R. C. Brooks of Tabor, Io. This church was organized by Rev. P. S. Knight, and served by him for two years without salary. He also planned the building, completed and dedicated it.

CLACKAMAS.—This church, organized 18 months ago by Rev. D. B. Gray, superintendent of the Portland City Missionary Society, dedicated its house of worship, June 21, free of debt, save $500 from the C. C. B. S. The building and lot cost $1,850. Following the dedication an after meeting was held, when six persons professed conversion.

SALEM.—Central. The members are all poor, but have good staying qualities. They have no church building, but hold meetings in a house provided by Rev. P. S. Knight at a nominal expense. The attendance is good and Sunday school increasing. Mr. Knight has served the church from the first without salary.

CORVALLIS.—The special meetings at Plymouth Church conducted by Rev. H. J. Zercher, assisted by Rev. Messrs. A. Brady and C. E. Lambert, closed June 17, with 17 accessions. The entire membership has been greatly revived.

HUNTINGTON.—Every wage-earner, with one exception, in this frontier town, 408 miles east of Portland, contributes to the support of this work, of which Rev. F. W. Parker has the oversight.

In all the Oregon churches Children's Day was more generally observed than ever before. The reports are not all in yet, but it is believed the contributions to the C. S. S. and P. S. are largely in excess of any previous year.

Washington.

SEATTLE.—Plymouth. The closing Sunday in June completed a year of the pastorate of Rev. W. H. G. Temple and found the hearts of people and pastor more closely knit together than ever has been known before in the history of this church. Owing to the illness of his son Mr. Temple will remain at home this summer, without a vacation, and supply his own pulpit.——Taylor. Rev. G. H. Lee takes a vacation of two months, spending most of that time in Cincinnati, O., where he will supply the pulpit of his brother, Rev. E. T. Lee, D. D. Rev. E. P. Dada, late of Nebraska, will supply this church for the summer. The pastor has labored very hard since his coming in the fall of 1890, and has been eminently successful in a part of the city where the population has been constantly shifting. The Sunday school has an enrollment of over 250.

ESTIMATES OF MEN AND WOMEN.

THOMAS HARDY.

Jude, the Obscure is not a truthful reproduction of life. It sacrifices the probabilities everywhere to the exigencies of the plot. . . . He furnishes a mild article for the family magazine and a highly spiced one for the dura ilia of the general public. Is this the attitude of a great literary artist with a single and consistent theory of his art? Is it not rather the canny suppleness of the smug peddler who with equal indifference vends a child's primer or brings out with a knowing leer a bundle of flash stories? . . . In Jude, the Obscure Mr. Hardy is merely speculating in smut.—The Bookman.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

A better cross of the Knickerbocker and Puritan could not be desired than becomes more and more manifest as the character of Theodore Roosevelt unfolds itself. He possesses an element of humor in his composition which tempers his grim decisiveness. He moves among his fellowmen to do a man's work, and is not to be defeated by every obstacle. Those who did not consider him eminently practical—many of them at best—have discovered their mistake. Nothing of the dare-devil crops out in any of his measures, but he brings into daily practice a "saving common sense," as well as the courage of his convictions. Roosevelt's course is watched with great interest. He seems to be realizing in his career—and that is a great thing for any official to do—how a man can boast of being an ardent partisan, and yet not allow his partisan preferences to influence him a particle in performing the duties of his station. This alone would make him an unusual product of our institutions. The people, after all, like a man possessing mental fortitude enough to endure defeat without being soured. —Boston Transcript.

HELEN KELLER.

I believe that she is the purest minded human being ever in existence. She has never known or thought any evil. She does not suspect it in others. The world to her is what her own mind is. She has not even learned that exhibition upon which so many pride themselves of "righteous indignation." . . . In all her education Helen has been put in communication with the best minds, with the best literature. She has known no other. Her mind has neither been made effeminate by the weak and silly literature, nor has it been vitiated by that which is suggestive of baseness. In consequence, her mind is not only vigorous, but it is pure. She is in love with noble things, with noble thoughts and with the characters of noble men and women. It is not a possible condition for most of us in the world, but nevertheless the experiment of her education is very suggestive. If children in the family and in the public schools were fed with only the best literature, if their minds were treated with as much care in regard to the things sown in them as our wheat fields, what a result we should have!—Charles Dudley Warner.

OVER THE PRECIPICE

Do you remember the Quaker who advertised for a coachman, and asked the 26 applicants one question: "How near can you drive to the edge of a precipice?" The answers were much alike. One man said 8 feet, four said 4 feet, and a dozen said 2 feet. Five men put it at 1 foot, two men asked only for 6 inches, and one said "on the edge itself." One man only remained, and he was leaving the room quietly, when the Quaker called him back. The man apologized for leaving, but said he was not the man for the situation, as he could be depended upon to drive "as far from a precipice as possible." He was the man the Quaker wanted!

In the purchase of furniture the whole question is: "How near do you want to drive to the precipice of unwise economy?" If you want $9 Morris Chairs, or $11 Chamber Sets, you must go to some house which is not a furniture house. We can be depended upon to drive you as far from that edge of the precipice as possible.

Our furniture lasts a lifetime. You can't wear it out. It is the cheapest of all reliable furniture in this country.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

It is to be a square fight in November, for which the business interests are thankful, as all compromises, sops and legislation to conciliate the silver men are now out of the question. At Chicago the silver forces committed the grievous error of erecting a too radical platform, containing suggestions of revolution and incendiary phrases in some of its planks, thus frightening and disgusting large numbers of men who might otherwise have remained friendly to the ticket. It is the knowledge that this error of the silver people will tell heavily against them that makes the sound money men so confident of victory.

Regarding general trade there is little to write. The usual midsummer dullness has settled down, which is intensified this year by the political campaign. The movement of staples during last week was smaller than during the previous one, which is not to be wondered at considering the weather and the character of the Chicago platform. Conservatism is now the watchword in the business world, and merchants buy only from hand to mouth.

The demand for wool, iron and steel and cotton goods does not improve, even though production has been considerably scaled. Shoe manufacturers have been quite busy recently, but latterly orders have fallen off. The volume of bank clearings throughout the United States last week reveals the poor condition of trade, aggregating only $98,000,000, a decline from the previous week of eleven per cent., and a falling off compared with last year of fourteen per cent.

The stock market reflects a more confident feeling and the disposition to buy good stocks on breaks is more pronounced than at any time since the close of the St. Louis Republican convention. If gold exports are resumed the treasury reserve will again become troublesome, being already under the hundred million mark.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

REV. JACOB FRANK ELLIS, D. D.,

Who died in Greenwich, Ct., June 29, was born in Fremont, O., Oct. 11, 1842. When the war broke out he left Wheaton College to enlist as a private soldier, and fought through the war, being severely wounded in one of the battles near Atlanta. In 1869 Mr. Ellis graduated from Wheaton College, having supported himself and his mother by unusual energy and economy. He graduated from Oberlin Theological Seminary in 1873, and after one year of pastoral work in Toledo, O., and eighteen months in Forest Grove, Ore., became pastor of the church in Seattle, Wn., where he spent seven years, 1876–1883.

Through the urgency of the late Dr. G. H. Atkinson he accepted the chair of president of Pacific University and for eight years, 1883–1891, remained there. In 1894 he accepted a pastorate in Neligh, Neb., but in a few months was called to the presidency of Gates College. On the organization of Norfolk College Dr. Ellis was chosen as its first president, and gave to its service the last months of his life. In February, 1896, the ill health which for years had impaired his strength developed into a pronounced form of Bright's disease, and it was in a vain effort to find relief at the seashore that by a triumphant death he entered into the life eternal. He was buried in Norfolk, Neb.

REV. EDWARD PAYSON BAKER, whose death occurred in Ben Lomond, Cal., June 20, was born Nov. 3, 1830, in Phillipston, Mass., graduated from Amherst College in 1853 and from Bangor Theological Seminary in 1857. For several years he preached in Maine, having pastorates at Dennysville, East Machias and Winthrop. In 1872 Mr. Baker went to California, preached a few months in Santa Barbara and was for seven years pastor of the Third Church, San Francisco. His last pastorate was in Hilo, Hawaiian Islands, where he remained doing excellent work for fourteen years. Of late he has been living quietly with members of his family in California.

TIME-TRIED AND PROVED.—There is nothing like a well-tried and proved remedy. For more than thirty years Adamson's Botanic Cough Balsam has been the favorite in thousands of homes for coughs and all forms of throat and lung troubles. Sold by all druggists.

AN opportunity to combine recreation and instruction is provided at the New England Chautauqua Sunday School Assembly at Lakeview, South Framingham, Mass. The opening service occurs Monday evening, the 20th, and consists of introductory remarks by the president, Rev. William R. Clark, D.D., a lecture by the eloquent Rev. Russell H. Conwell, D.D., and illumination and fireworks. Then follow eleven days of lectures, entertainments, concerts, class instruction in Bible literature, elocution and music. The talent includes the following eminent men and women: Rev. Russell H. Conwell, D.D., Prof. William A. Scott, Mr. Frank Emery Buker. Dwight L. Moody, Rev. E. M. Taylor, Rev. Fred Gardner, Rev. T. J. B. House, Prof. Fred J. Stanley, Rev. H. C. Farrar, D.D., Rev. W. L. Davidson, D.D., Prof. Edward S. Morse, Mrs. Addie Chase Smith, Miss Emily Robinson, Mrs. Mary A. Livermore, Mrs. S.S. Fessenden, Rev. A. A. Wright, D.D., Prof. George W. Pease, Mr. Charles Malloy, Prof. Booker T. Washington, Chaplain William Henry Milburn, D.D., Rev. George A. Gordon, D.D., Prof. Charles E. Boyd, Rev. Charles L. Merriam, Thomas's Cambridge Orchestra and Military Band. Great effort has been made to make several special days unusually attractive. Among these are Young People's Day, July 22, when D. L. Moody, and other prominent workers, will be present; Temperance Day, the 23d, with Mrs. Mary A. Livermore and Mrs. Susan Fessenden as speakers; Sunday School Normal Union and Children's Day, Saturday, the 25th, with addresses and an entertainment suited to the occasion; National Day, July 28, when patriotic music and inspiring addresses will stimulate love for our country; C. L. S. C. Recognition Day, Thursday, the 30th, with the procession, address by Rev. George A. Gordon, D.D., and the graduating exercises of the Class of '96; and Musical Day, the 31st, which will be especially attractive this year. In the morning instrumental music will be made prominent, and the assembly talent will be assisted by Miss Emily Robinson as reader. In the afternoon Professor Boyd, with his chorus of probably 200 voices, will render the oratorio of The Prodigal Son, by Sir Arthur Sullivan. In the evening the entire musical talent of the assembly will be heard in the cantata of the Wreck of the Hesperus, by Anderton. No lover of music who can possibly be present on this day should deny himself this rich treat. Programs can be obtained by writing Mr. Samuel Cochrane, South Framingham, Mass.

RESPONSIBILITIES OF LIBERTY.

What a magnificent thing is liberty! How through all the ages of the past have men suffered for it and died for it! How have they consoled themselves through hardship and sacrifice by the vision of the coming time, when, partly through their labors, man should be free! Well, freedom is at last secured. What prophets and righteous men have desired to see and have not seen is the reality in the midst of which we dwell. If these seers could behold the reality do you think it would seem to them quite to fulfill their dream? They saw men in their vision seriously gathering to select their best and their wisest to frame and execute the laws that should protect, while they did not hamper, the activities of life. They saw in their vision those thus called to high places entering seriously and reverently upon their work, consulting only for the best good of their country. This they saw in their vision; would they see it in the reality? Liberty they might have pictured as a tree, beautiful in its growth, its leafage and its fruit. If they could behold the present they would see the tree strong and stately, but how defiled would they find it by the corruption that feeds upon its fairest leaves and spins its loathsome nest even on its loftiest branches! Are Americans in love with liberty? Why, then, do so many, against their better judgment or without serious thought, follow their political leaders, or idly stand aloof, raising no arm against the tyranny that is working mischief for our best interests? Why do so many create masters for themselves, at whose command they give up the right to earn their daily bread? We have no kings so we make them, or oftener let them make themselves, and I cannot see that they are better than those our fathers cast aside.—Prof. C. C. Everett, D. D.

THE MISSION OF THE UNITED STATES.

I believe that this nation has a mission in the world, a noble mission. But it is not by force of arms to carry to the people of the earth the blessings of liberty and self-government; not by force of arms, but first by taking in the peoples of the earth to our own land and there teaching them the blessings of liberty. Have we not done that? And this great nation has taught the principles of self-government, freedom and peace to all the 70,000,000 that now inhabit this continental territory. There is only one other means by which we should teach these principles to men. It is by example; by the example of happiness and prosperity wrought out through practical living out of freedom and peace. Never should we advocate the extension of our institutions by force of arms, either on sea or on land!—President Eliot of Harvard.

WHAT ARE COUNCILS FOR?

Would it not be timely to define just where we are in the matter of our conception and use of Congregational councils? I find the average layman is not satisfied with the ingenious explanations of the ministers in regard to the present working of councils. He says, as most councils are called and conducted, that they are a farce. That they pretend to mean something and do not mean it. That it is a form out of which the original significance has gone. Now take two recent councils to which my church has been invited. One was to dismiss a pastor and the other to install him. Neither invitation was framed after the forms given in Dr. Dexter's Handbook of Congregationalism. There were changes enough in the form to indicate that the idea of the council has changed. To dismiss a pastor we were invited thus: "Our pastor having presented his resignation, and we having accepted the same, we invite you to convene, etc., to review our proceedings and advise us in the matter." The council convened and then it appeared that a call to another church had been accepted, that the farewell sermon had been preached, that the first sermon in the new field was to be preached the next Sunday, that his household effects had been shipped to the new home. The departing, or rather departed, minister made it appear very sharply that everything had been settled, and he wanted his papers of commendation from the council. He told how definitely everything had been decided, and it was no use for the council to consider at all whether he ought to leave that field against the unanimous wishes of his people; he had left, and they had let him go, and that was all there was to it. And yet the letter missive called for advice. My delegate, a business man, expressed his disgust with that sort of thing. He felt that a form was used which did not at all express what was asked of the council. All that was wanted was a pleasant send-off.

The other council to install was invited to "examine the candidate and, if judged expedient, to assist in the service of installation in the evening." We were not asked to "review our proceedings" and the full records were not given, and even when the omission was noted, and full records called for as to the action of society, they were not given designedly, though the clerk in reading them stumbled a bit and showed what parts were withheld. When it came to the examination the council found they had a case indeed. The theology of the candidate was so startling that the examination continued till within fifteen minutes of the hour for the installation service. Even the most radical and liberal were not satisfied. Here was a man floundering around in the depths of Hegelian pantheism, as near as could be determined. He could not accept even the Apostles' Creed, much less creeds of "acknowledged weight." He objected even to use of Te Deum in worship. The Lord's Supper and baptism were matters of indifference. His condition of church membership was this, that a man should be trying to live righteously and help others to do the same. The Salvation Army in his conception was a true church, and so on.

When it came to the question of approval there was a sense of impotency felt by everybody. The majority were not satisfied. If the question had been, Are these the views of the Congregational churches? it would have been answered, No. And here again the laymen spoke, they showed the same common sense as in the other council, and said plainly: "This is not Christianity as we are taught it." A minority of the council took this ground: "We have examined this brother and we do not approve of his installation," and so voted. But others said: "He is young, he will outgrow it," another, "He speaks a strange dialect, but the root of the matter is in him"; and so the majority, though expressing individually dissatisfaction, acquiesced in the installation.

Now the question is this: In the first case it seemed that the church did not treat the council fairly and honestly. It sought advice, when, at the same time, the matter was settled and the time had clearly gone by for advice. In the second, the council did not treat the church fairly. The church left the matter of examination to the council, and was, it seems to me, entitled the judgment of the council as to the theological views and manner of teaching of the candidate. The church members themselves probably never dreamed of the revelation that the examination made. Some of them expressed their astonishment and sorrow. Was not that council, if councils are to mean anything and have any value, recreant to its duty? Now some laymen ask, "Why have a council and why examine a candidate?" Do we do it for amusement, or to determine whether the pastors' teaching can receive the fellowship of the churches? M.

INSURING THE PURCHASE.—The general impression which prevails that all classes of goods can be bought cheaper in a department store than if bought of a private dealer is liable to lead to much mischief, especially in certain lines of goods. For example, there can be no question but that furniture should always be bought of a furniture dealer and never of a department store. The difference in price is rarely perceptible, and with the reliable furniture bought of the manufacturer you have a guarantee of quality equal to an insurance policy. With such a house in this city as the Paine Furniture Co. there is no cause for complaint of high prices

PRAYER MEETING.

BY REV. H. A. BRIDGMAN.

Topic for July 26–Aug. 1. Claiming the Promises—What and How. Isa. 40: 25-31.

We fail sometimes to realize the good we might obtain from the promises through regarding them in the bulk and not singly. We are like a man who wanders listlessly through a great library overwhelmed by the number of books on the shelves. The library is absolutely useless to him, because he knows not how to get at the books or which of them he will be interested in reading. Suppose we should take one promise a day, or one a week, and cast ourselves upon it until we have discovered its meaning and proved its truth.

This requires discrimination on our part. Not all of God's promises are meant for everybody. They are designedly many and varied, because there are all sorts of people in the world and because each individual during his life passes through a variety of moods. Those promises, for instance, which relate to God's comfort in sorrow and adversity cannot mean much to the happy, prosperous person. He must enter into the dark valley before he can test God's assurances of his presence there. He must come to the sunset slope of life before God's words respecting his presence with his own, even unto old age, come home with force.

But one does not have to search long to find some promise exactly fitted to his need. If you want to work for Christ there are abundant assurances of divine direction. If you are in doubt or perplexity there is the guarantee that the way will be made clear. If your spiritual life seems cold or barren promises to persons in just such a condition are not lacking. If your life is full and joyous, and you yearn, nevertheless, after larger attainments and achievements, there are encouragements and rewards adapted to such a state. Learn to understand your condition well enough to determine just what promises you ought to claim at a given time or in a given emergency.

To claim the promises without fulfilling the conditions shows that greed rather than grace is animating one. Divine blessings would hardly be worth the asking if they came to the careless and worldly minded as freely as to those whose hearts are set on God, and who are trying to follow Christ. God cannot give his richest blessings to those who do not yearn and seek for them. It is only those who wait upon him who renew their strength. We make a sad mistake if we think we can rush into his presence for two or three minutes at the beginning of the day and claim the immediate and boundless fulfillment of all his promises. By cultivating the quiet mind, by learning to look to him often during the day, by emptying our hearts of that which is trifling and selfish do we come into the condition that admits of his filling us full of his strength and grace.

Parallel verses: Ps. 37: 91; Josh. 1: 8, 9; Isa. 51: 12-16; John 14: 16-21; 2 Cor. 12: 9; Matt. 28: 20; Phil 4: 19; Ps. 23: 4.

NORTH WISCONSIN ACADEMY COMMENCEMENT.

This new Congregational educational missionary enterprise may now be said to have fairly won its spurs. It sent out its first graduation class June 23, and, although only five in number, three young men and two young women, the class displayed character and scholarship of which any college fitting school may be proud. The address to the graduates on Enthusiasm and Culture, by Rev. C. H. Patton of Duluth, showed him thoroughly sympathetic with the needs of this part of the new West. The existence of such an institution alongside the State public schools is justified to any one who has carefully noted the trend in State education as shown in high school graduations. The ideals and spirit of these academy students are much higher than the general public sentiment and show the influence of the high-thinking and sublime purpose of New England.

This academy has had a hard struggle to live. It has come into North Wisconsin as something "born from above" by means of the missionary spirit of a few brave and consecrated souls. Rev. E. P. Wheeler of Ashland, who left the pastorate of the Congregational church in that city to serve the institution, is its father and real founder. To help it through the crisis of the past year the late Rev. G. W. Nelson gave the last energies of his consecrated life. Teachers have served on small salaries, long deferred in payment, for love of the cause. Mr. Wheeler has worked as principal, financial agent, and everything else to help the academy for pure love, accepting the past year no financial remuneration.

A year ago the debt was $17,000. It is now reduced to $14,000, and the current expenses for the year are pretty well provided for. The institution has a chance to live, abiding the time when some servant of Christ sees here his opportunity to make a considerable investment for Christian education. New England has sent here the leaven of the higher life. Will it send here, also, the endowment which will help to save Wisconsin for Christ?

I conceive the true function of the temperance advocate to be that of a contributor, one among many, to the establishment of a more elevated and more refined standard of consumption. As such it is of the utmost importance that he should recognize the limits of the work he can do, and the need he has of the close and harmonious co-operation of social reformers who are engaged in other ways in trying to raise quantitatively and qualitatively this same standard of life.—J. A. Hobson.

HAY FEVER.

A Discovery for This Malady at Last—Relief at Your Own Home.

No one but the sufferer from hay fever knows the agony that attends this torturing malady. A continual round of sneezing, eyes that are weak, watery and inflamed, a nose that runs without cessation, and grows more sore every hour, inability to breathe, nights that become hours of torture, days that are long drawn out and full of suffering—and all this continues until the sufferer is obliged to pack up and go to some locality where this disease does not thrive. Formerly it was considered that the only way hay fever could be relieved was by a change of climate, the mountains of New Hampshire being noted as one of the best places in the world for this purpose. Now it is known by physicians and patients alike that sufferers of this trouble can be relieved at home by the use of X-Zalia. The preparation is an entirely new discovery in medicine, its merits for the relief of hay fever only becoming known within the last year or two.

X-Zalia is made from the sap of a certain tree, combined with other vegetable ingredients found in New Hampshire, and contains the necessary medicinal properties that have made New Hampshire air famous for the virtuous qualities it contains for the cure of this disease. Many sufferers who were skeptical have tried X-Zalia, and, to their surprise, found relief. Among those who may be referred to are Mr. W. F. Lakin, manager Consolidated Store Service Company, Fiske Building, State St., Boston; Mr. George E. Armstrong, of the firm of Clark, Ward & Co., bankers, Equitable Building, Boston; Mr C. H. Stevens, Phillips Building, Boston; Mr. Walter L. Frost, 8 Congress St., Boston; Mrs. Wm. F. Richardson, 12 Elm St., South Framingham, Mass.; U. S. Senator J. H. Gallinger, New Hampshire.

It is expensive to take a long trip to the mountains for relief. It does not cost you much to try X Zalia right here at home, and be convinced as to whether it does what is claimed for it or not. Ask your druggist for X-Zalia. If he does not keep it send $1 to The X-Zalia Company, No. 3 Beacon St., Boston, Mass., and they will send one of their largest bottles, express paid, anywhere on line of railroad in the United States.

THE TRUTH.

That the price of STEARNS Bicycles is maintained while nearly every other wheel is sold at a cut, either openly by the makers, or by the agent (whose large discount practically invites this method), is the best advertisement the Yellow Fellow could have.

THE MORAL.

When buying a wheel select a STEARNS of standard value first, and avoid those dire pangs of regret occasioned by knowing that another person may in two weeks' time from your purchase procure the same make wheel at a drop price.

Born Sept. 23, 1823; died July 13, 1896.
Fifty years in the service of the Congregational Sunday School and Publishing Society.

NO agent ever has been, or ever will be, found more faithful in his devotion to the interests of the Congregational Publishing House than was Deacon George P. Smith. Its interests were his interests. . . . If I may be allowed to suggest the two leading characteristics of his religious life that have come especially to my notice, I should say they are his strict conscientiousness in the discharge of secular and religious duties and his firm faith in the fundamental doctrines of the Christian religion.—From the address of Prof. L. T. Townsend at the funeral of Mr. Smith.

DR. CLARK'S SECOND TRIP AROUND THE WORLD.

Christian Endeavorers the world over will follow with prayerful interest their president, Dr. F. E. Clark, as he sets out on his second year's journey in foreign lands. He preached a farewell sermon last Sunday in his old pulpit at Williston Church, Portland, Me., preparatory to sailing this week, Thursday, from New York on the Fürst Bismarck. He goes direct to France, thence to Switzerland, where he hopes to spend about a month as a vacation period. Then meetings and conventions will be the occasion of a two weeks' tour of France and a little longer stay in Germany, in both of which countries the C. E. movement is making encouraging headway. Scandinavia will also have a visit from Dr. Clark, during which he will attend an important meeting in Stockholm. The Irish convention in Belfast, Oct. 1, will be encouraged by his presence, and then, after other meetings in Central Europe, notably the second German national convention at Berlin, his line of travel will take him about Christmas time to India for two months, and possibly to Burmah. South Africa will be his next field of operations, where already Christian Endeavor has found a foothold. Two months will be consumed in Cape Town, the Transvaal, Natal and the Orange Free State, whence he will depart for England to attend the British National Convention at Liverpool in June. From there his route will be to San Francisco for the next international convention.

It is a shame for any clergyman to go into his pulpit without specific preparation for every portion of the service he is to lead—for his Bible reading, his hymn reading, his preaching and his praying.—H. Clay Trumbull.

CHURCH REMODELING.
THOMAS W. SILLOWAY, Church Architect,
10 Park Square, Boston.

Mr. Silloway's long practice in building or remodeling over 400 church edifices enables him to save and utilize all the valuable parts, and for a comparatively small outlay produce a building preferable to a new one of much greater cost. He proposes to continue the work of remodeling as a specialty, and tenders his services to committees who would practice economy, and where the means are limited.

Railroads and Excursions.

From the noisy, dusty city
To the country's cool retreat,
Far beyond the grime and bustle,
Far beyond the jar and beat:
'Mid the long and tangled grasses,
Perfume-laden woods and nooks,
Noting not the hour that passes,
Just enjoying rest or books;
On the quiet lake a-trolling,
Or along some cool stream wading,
With indifference a-strolling
In the sunshine or the shading;
Whence no sound disturbs the stillness
Save the distant cawing crows
And the hours pass by unnoticed
Till the happy evening's close.

OUR European pilgrims are drawing near the close of their delightful journey to Old World Shrines. Indeed, the main trip, which embraced England, Holland and a portion of Switzerland, is practically concluded this week, though a considerable number will take the supplementary tours scheduled to occupy the remainder of the month. It is a remarkable fact that the list of nearly fifty passengers prepared a week before the departure from New York was maintained without a single change until the sailing for Holland at the close of the English tour, every name upon this original list appearing in autograph in the clerk's record-book at the old Meeting House at Norwich, which was visited formally on the evening of the last day in England. At that point Mr. Whittemore and Mr. Dexter left the party, the former arriving in this city last week Friday. As the first of the pilgrims to return, his account of the demonstrations at all points in honor of the party makes us realize even more vividly than letters and press reports what rich and rare privileges have been the portion of our pilgrims. The tour has, not inaptly, been designated by some of the English papers, "A Royal Progress." We are glad to be able to say that the Holland trip has been equally successful, though in a different way, as was to be expected. The English contingent, including Dr. Mackennal and daughter, which joined the party at Norwich for Holland, added largely to the enjoyment of the American pilgrims.

The Massachusetts Railroad Commissioners have made an important decision and established a far-reaching precedent in regard to the use of the Lord's Day by transportation companies. On the one hand they have forbidden a steamboat company, which is wholly engaged in the excursion business, using their boats only in the summertime, to use them for that business on the public rest day, and, on the other, they have limited another company engaged in the regular business of transportation to two trips each way upon their regular route and with their ordinary stops, expressly forbidding lowering of fare or any of the extra attractions which turn the trip into an "excursion." This is a position which we can heartily indorse. The use of the day of public rest as an opportunity of special money-making and temptation must in every way be discouraged if we are to retain its benefits without loss.

"The silver question: the question of how much money there is in the collection basket," is the facetious turn which one of our contemporaries gives to one of the great but secondary issues of the campaign. But it is in order to ask, with all soberness, How much money would there be in the treasuries of our missionary societies and philanthropic institutions should the United States accept the monetary standard of Mexico and China, and how far would the money then contributed go toward supporting the work which societies engaged in foreign lands now have? This latter question is easier to answer than the former, for it is a condition and not a theory that confronts the questioner. Foreign missionary boards in this country are forced, whether they will or no, to do business on the gold basis, for they are dealing with a commercial world that maintains the gold standard. Even banks in countries like China refuse to give the slightest attention to drafts for mission expenses unless they bear the word "gold" on them. This being so, it is apparent that our foreign missionary societies would, if the country went to a silver basis, have to do one of two things—cut down expenses fifty per cent. or receive twice as much from their constituents. In view of the radical and sweeping reductions already made on the mission fields as the result of decreased receipts; in view of the debts which still exist or impend; in view of the impaired earning capacity, and hence giving capacity, of the supporters of foreign missions today, it hardly seems safe to anticipate a doubling of the number of nominal dollars, and it is heart-breaking to contemplate further retrenchment on the mission field. The statistics respecting the present condition of the American Board, given elsewhere, deserve thoughtful consideration.

When men of the stamp of ex Governor Russell die it cannot escape notice that their moral qualities occasion the warmest commendation. The world admires brilliancy of intellect, but it reserves its finest praise for uprightness of heart and fidelity and unselfishness of conduct. Cornelius Vanderbilt's serious illness during the past week has moved the press of the country to set forth his many virtues, and the universal admission is that were millionaires generally possessed of his sense of solemn responsibility for the possession of great wealth and business talents there would be far less justification of the popular outcry against the accumulation of wealth. There are certainly some rich men in this country who have not forgotten Jesus' illustration of the camel and the needle's eye.

We have already alluded to the tribute paid to the Pilgrim fathers by Englishmen and Americans assembled at Gainsborough when the corner stone of the John Robinson Memorial Church there was laid three weeks ago, at the time of the visit of The Congregationalist's pilgrims. We shall in a forthcoming issue print Ambassador Bayard's admirable address, as well as describe the occasion more fully. But it is fitting at once to note the significant assembly at Provincetown last week, where for the first time, in an adequate way, the commonwealth of Massachusetts recognized the fact that the famous compact or constitution of government which the Pilgrims signed in the cabin of the Mayflower received its signatures, Nov. 11, 1620, while the Mayflower was anchored in Provincetown harbor. Hon. William T. Davis, chairman of the Old Colony Commission, presented to the commonwealth a granite monument with bronze tablets, which was formally accepted by Governor Wolcott's representative, Col. Henry A. Thomas, who in turn presented it to the town. One tablet is an artistic representation in bronze of the historic scene in the cabin of the Mayflower, and the other, and larger, tablet has engraved upon it in imperishable letters the text of the noble compact which Carver, Bradford, Winslow, Brewster and the others signed. The speeches made on this notable occasion revealed the fact that there still exist men with the same noble ideals that the Pilgrims had, and that they are imbued with the determination to pass on to their children that which their fathers bequeathed to them.

Whether our Christian young men and women could have laid such plans, met such difficulties and won such victories fifteen years ago as an international convention of Christian Endeavor of the day presents may be reasonably doubted. On the other hand, what a decade and a half of Christian Endeavor training has meant to the leaders of our young people in the society can be read in the success of the now lengthening series of annual gatherings. What daily prayer, weekly testimony and monthly consecration have effected in these young lives is beyond the words of President Clark or Secretary Baer to more than suggest. What care of details, what fidelity on the part of the hundreds of Endeavor workers in preparation and what persistence to the end must be pledged for such a group of conventions as the yearly meeting has now become can only be guessed by the on-lookers, who see and wonder but who can neither count the pains nor the power. Already next year's plans are well under way, and many who did not see the capital this year have planned to follow the hosts of Endeavor to the Golden Gate.

The author of The Bonnie Brier Bush, when he comes to this country in September, is sure of as widespread and as warm a welcome as has ever been accorded to a visitor from over the seas. Mr. J. B. Pond of New York, who manages his lectures, says that he is in greater demand than any foreigner who has ever come here, not even excepting Stanley. Already most of the fifty-five appointments for the lectures which he will give on this side the water have been made. We trust Dr. Watson will not be tied so closely to the mandates of his manager that it will be exceedingly difficult to hear him preach and speak elsewhere than on the lecture platform. His course at Yale will naturally be open to the public, and we hope that elsewhere in the country one whom the common people would hear most gladly will be accessible to them. It is a pleasure to hear that Dr. Robertson Nicoll of the British Weekly also expects to visit America this autumn.

SUBSTITUTES FOR THE SALOON.

Thanks to the Massachusetts State Board of Statistics, the Board of Police Commissioners of the City of Boston, and the Committee of Fifty, of which Hon. Seth Low is president, Prof. F. G. Peabody of Harvard secretary and William E. Dodge, Esq., treasurer, the readers of the July Forum are presented with a notable article discussing one phase of the temperance problem. The article is very significant, both because of the facts which it declares and the temper and method with which they are analyzed.

Setting forth, not with the old theory that the man who enters a saloon of necessity does so because he is forced by the devil to do evil, or by his thirst to assuage it, but with the belief that the saloon flourishes primarily because it appeals to and satisfies the instincts of men who find no other place for being sociable with their fellowmen, Professor Peabody of Harvard, who writes the article, last year set about determining, with approximate accuracy, the exact dimensions of the traffic in liquor in the saloons of Boston and the proportions of the movement to counteract the malign influence of the saloon by providing substitutes for it. That movement had its origin in the conviction that the most important step in temperance reform to be taken at the present time and the future is that which provides satisfaction for the social instincts of the average man, without the accompanying risk of temptation to indulge in intoxicating liquor.

Professor Peabody found in 1895, making no account of the hotels, clubs holding licenses, or licensed groceries, but calculating only those places which are commonly called saloons, in number 606, that these received the daily patronage of 226,752 people. Since the population of the city at the time was about 496,920, it might seem that nearly fifty per cent. of the people of Boston patronized the saloons each day, were it not for the fact that Boston saloons are the basis of supply for citizens of many cities and towns roundabout which have no saloons, and the place of business of thousands of men resident in the country who resort to Boston saloons. Estimating that the average patron of the saloon spends at least ten cents every day, then in a year, excluding Sundays and holidays, when the saloons are closed, the large sum of $6,802,500 passes from the pockets of the drinkers into the tills of the Boston saloon keepers. The amount is large enough to support more than 11,330 families for a year, permitting an annual expenditure by each family of $600.

As for the substitutes for the saloon, excluding such admirable temperance agencies as the East Boston Athletic Association, the Charlesbank Gymnasium and the Wells Institute, which do much to satisfy the social instincts of many of the men of the city, and including only poolrooms, coffee-rooms, lunchrooms, reading-rooms and clubs which have not liquor licenses, it was found that "notwithstanding the inadequacy of many of these resorts, their meager provision for sociability and comfort as compared with the splendor of the saloons and the disadvantages under which some of them are put by regarding sociability as secondary to moral or religious influence," they nevertheless had a daily patronage approximating 99,000. Excellent as this showing is, it might be bettered very speedily if, as Professor Peabody points out, there were an alliance of all the forces engaged in the work, the religious and the secular, Catholic and Protestant, and a careful division of fields of operation; for at present, as he only too truthfully declares, "The saloons, though competitors of each other, are united by the strongest ties and against hostile influences are massed as an army," while, on the other hand, the "substitutes for the saloon are little, scattered enterpises—often of the most conscientious and generous nature—but in most instances without even the slightest mutual alliance and in some instances without even the knowledge of each others' operations."

Professor Peabody does not hesitate to point out with candor that much of the failure of the substitute for the saloon as it is managed at present is due to the fact that those who support and manage it attempt to convert the club or saloon into a hunting ground for the church, whereas he contends, and we think justly, that "in a genuine poor man's club—as in a rich man's club—visible signs of religious intention must be eliminated. The fact is that in temperance, as in scientific charity, we are called upon to recognize the deeper and unostentatious place of religious influence in social reform. It inspires and directs philanthropic service, but it does not make philanthropy an institution of propagandism." Professor Peabody in this article does not refer to what has been so clearly demonstrated in England, viz., that a coffee house as a substitute for a saloon can be made a financial as well as a social success. Some day wide-awake American business men, bent on doing good to their fellowmen and at the same time earning a reasonable reward for money invested, will realize the duty and opportunity which they have so long neglected.

It is true that just now there is a waning of the old-time fervor of personal labor in winning individuals to temperance and a like abatement of activity on the part of some of those who a few years ago based much reliance upon constitutional amendments and statutory law to bring to pass the dethronement of King Alcohol, but it by no means follows that intemperance is more general than it was a generation or two ago, or that God-fearing and man-loving people are less concerned with the problem than they were then. There is more light and less heat than there used to be. Dogmatism is not quite as rampant as it was. The solution of the matter does not seem as simple as of yore. Men are coming to realize that the question must be looked at from the historic and economic standpoints as well as the physiological and ethical, and as an illustration of the new method of treating and the new way of approaching this momentous and intricate problem Professor Peabody's article, the first fruit of the investigations of that remarkable self-constituted committee of fifty experts, is admirable, prophetic of good, and well repays careful reading and thought.

A QUESTION OF ETHICS.

The Evangelical Messenger advises its readers that, since the dominant issues of this political campaign are "exclusively economic questions, appealing to the financial self-interests of the individual voter," therefore it does not become them as "pilgrims and strangers on the earth to become excited or forsake the prayer meeting for the caucus or the debate." If this were an ordinary campaign, if the issues were "exclusively economic," if the only appeal made to the voter were one affecting his pocketbook solely, then there might be some cause for the contention of the Messenger, but, as we pointed out last week, the issue is not economic, personal or sectional, but ethical and national.

In support of this affirmation we can cite no less an authority than Mr. Bryan, the Democratic candidate, who, in his speech at Champaign, Ill., last week, said: "Every great economic question is a great moral question. When we come to the settlement of a question like that of the present campaign morality is involved." Were it necessary to cite proof that men of all parties and factions in the great contest realize that the real issue is an ethical one it would not be difficult to marshal the evidence.

This being so, editors of religious journals, Christian clergymen, Jewish rabbis and lecturers to societies of ethical culture have duties in this campaign which cannot be evaded. Already there are indications that most editors, preachers and other public teachers are not to be found wanting. There are a few, however, who seem to think that their duty is done by describing the beautiful home life of the candidates.

THE GIFT OF CHRIST.

What Christ offers us is not the absence of trouble but the overcoming of fear. "In the world ye shall have tribulation" might be said to all men, but our Lord takes special care to say it to his disciples that they may profit by the forewarning, and he takes care to add, "Be not afraid!" To whom could this be said except to those who had a source of comfort like that which kept the apostles from despair? This is a strange and unattractive program to the world's thinking—trouble first, then cheerfulness—a cheerfulness not based on our own victory but on assurance in the victory of another. The world's method would push trouble altogether out of sight that it might begin with happiness, and it would make victory altogether dependent upon self.

Thus at two different points it wholly misunderstands the ways of God. It fails to see that trouble is a necessary discipline for every man, and that it would be idle prophecy and mistaken kindness which left it out of the account of life. The difference between the Christian and the unbeliever is not in what they have to suffer, but in the strength in which they hope to overcome. Nor can the world grasp that identity of work and destiny in which Christ takes his people to himself and suffers in their suffering and makes them sharers of his overcoming.

The first work of victory which makes all other overcoming possible is won—won beyond need of repetition or possibility of question—but we, too, must be educated in the experience of struggle and made sharers in the joy of our own special victory. Otherwise how should we know the hights and depths of fellowship to which our Lord invites us? It is for this that we are left upon the earth. It is for this that we are tried with its griefs and perplexities and thrown in the way of the allurement of its sins. It is for this that each generation must take up the work of the fathers who are passing off the stage, and face the old problems in changed conditions, and add its contribution to the treasury of the world's art and knowledge, and pass off the stage in its own turn, feeling that its work is only half accomplished. It is this which makes us sorrow when we forget that we are set in changing circumstances that we may change. But in all experience of tribulation and disappointment it is the gift of Christ that there need be no agony of dread.

GEORGE P. SMITH.

It was well said at the funeral of George P. Smith last Wednesday, by Rev. Dr. C. B. Rice, that it was given to few laymen in the denomination to be known personally and through correspondence to so many Congregational ministers and laymen as was George P. Smith, who died at his home in Roxbury, July 13. Connected continuously with the C. S. S. and P. S. for the last fifty years, and since 1877 its agent, his name has been found on thousands of the publications of the society, and has been appended to its official correspondence times without number. Of a social disposition, he attached to himself those who had official business with the society in which he held so responsible a place, and individuals and groups sought his corner of the Congregational Book Store sure of a kindly greeting and a word or two that would cheer them on their way.

Mr. Smith, as his father and mother before him, was a native of Boston, educated in its schools and proud, as far as a man of unusual humility could be, of Boston citizenship. He has been identified with no less than five of our prominent churches, beginning with the old Pine Street organization, out of which grew Berkeley Temple, which he joined in July, 1842. Though at subsequent times a useful member of both Union and Mt. Vernon Churches, his activity and influence were most pronounced in the Phillips Church, South Boston, and the Immanuel Church, Roxbury. He found the former a congenial and stimulating church home for nearly twenty years, and in the latter his later years have been spent no less pleasantly and usefully. As a director of the American Congregational Association and a member of the Boston Congregational Club, he was brought into contact with wide and important interests of the denomination. He was one of those men to whom the title "deacon" seems to belong almost by divine appointment. Indeed his consecration to the office at the hands of the late Dr. Alden, his beloved pastor at South Boston, was a solemn devotion of himself to the service for life, and it followed as a matter of course that in later church relations he should become a member of the diaconate and fulfill his duties with the fidelity and thoroughness which characterized the man.

Mr. Smith's long connection with the Publishing Society made him familiar with all its departments. As a business man he was exact, painstaking, thorough and consistent. His daily tasks were done under the inspiration of strong and pervading religious beliefs. He did not invariably soar aloft on the wings of the most buoyant faith, but he held tenaciously to the fundamental things of the gospel, and they, in turn, sustained and cheered him through all the vicissitudes and disciplinary experiences of the passing years.

No finer tribute can be paid to Mr. Smith than to say that those who knew him best and were most intimate with him as associates or subordinates in business feel that they have lost a loyal, constant and helpful friend. The draped desk, at which with little intermission he had labored until a week ago Monday, stands as a mute but eloquent witness of the genuine sorrow which is felt not only in the room where he was the central figure but throughout the entire Congregational House.

The denomination may well be grateful for such extended and faithful service from one who labored in its behalf with untiring diligence and with the devotion of a man whose whole life was given to God. Surely the fruit of such consecrated toil will last forever.

SPIRITUAL INDEPENDENCE AND ITS LIMITS.

Spiritual independence is as real as any other. It is difficult to conceive of absolute, unlimited independence and we certainly have no practical knowledge of such a thing. Yet with certain inevitable limitations each of us is expected to be independent. We stand or fall for ourselves. Others may set us examples, may influence and even advise us, but we make our own choices and decisions. Each of us must bear his own responsibility.

The individual conscience, therefore, is supreme in an important sense. God would rather have us make mistakes of judgment now and then and be educated by the experience than be weakened and stunted by blind imitation of others, no matter how much wiser or better than ourselves. It often is a solemn duty to insist upon one's right to be thus independent and to refuse to be argued into compliance with the opinions of our friends. It is not a sin but a virtue to insist, if our firmness be also kindly, upon the exercise of this right.

Yet the opinions of others may not always be disregarded wisely or safely. We often may gain from them helpful aid in reaching our own conclusions. The sturdiest Christian independence will be very tender of the consciences of the weaker brethren, and will yield as much as is consistently possible rather than shock or grieve them. It is not as if the general sentiment of Christian people were of no consequence, even if it be not as fully enlightened as it will be at some future time. It is entitled to the respect and deference of even those who already have reached a higher level of spiritual intelligence.

There is no independence of the divine commands for a Christian. Nor is there independence of the circumstances and conditions of life, which modify duty constantly. There is no entire independence of the belief and practice of his fellow-Christians. Yet, after all, he must choose his own course and follow it with a single purpose to do the will of God.

CURRENT HISTORY.

Domestic Politics.

Mr. Bryan has been speaking to his former neighbors in Illinois, and has been cordially welcomed home to Lincoln, Neb., by his fellow-citizens, irrespective of party. It cannot be said that his many short, off-hand speeches have revealed unusual range or depth of thought. Early in August he and Mr. Sewall will be formally notified of their nominations at a great mass meeting to be held in Madison Square Garden, New York city, and from that time on Mr. Bryan will stump the country in his own behalf.

The Republican national executive committee has been named by its chairman, Mr. Hanna. New York and Chicago will be the headquarters. Some of the ablest speakers in the party are immediately to set forth West and South discussing the money question, and literature for the masses, in immense quantities, will soon be rolling off the presses. Mr. Hanna will have the advice of such old campaigners as Messrs. Quay of Pennsylvania and Manley of Maine, and at the same time have the enthusiastic support and energy of committeemen from the newer Western States. The fact that conventions of Republicans in States like South Dakota and Iowa have accepted the party platform without qualification indicates that the party as a whole is much more united than is its foe. The State Democracy faction of the Democratic party in New York State has bolted the Chicago platform and candidates. The Massachusetts Reform Club, whose members are all ardent tariff reformers or free traders, has voted to expend some of its funds in compassing the defeat of Bryan and Sewall, and its members are either committed to vote for Mr. McKinley or to a policy of masterly inactivity on election day. Secretaries Herbert and Olney of the Cabinet and Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Hamlin have joined the ranks of distinguished bolting Democrats, and scarcely a day passes without the defection of a Democratic newspaper or well-known political leader. Public Opinion, the eclectic, non-partisan weekly, reports that of fifty-eight leading Democratic journals which it has examined thirty-two repudiate the Chicago platform and twenty-four reject the candidates, and only fifteen declare for the candidates and the platform; while of the independent press, twenty-two out of thirty-seven newspapers reject the Democratic candidates and declare for Mr. McKinley.

Whether Democratic journals and voters who spurn the results at Chicago, but also dislike Mr. McKinley and his championship of protection, will have candidates, standing on a platform which they can indorse, to vote for is yet to be determined. The Illinois gold-standard Democrats have sent forth a call for all like-minded Democrats to join with them in perfecting State organizations and calling another Democratic convention. Much depends upon the action of the two conventions, the Populist and the Silver, to be held in St. Louis this week. The gathering of the Populists promises to be the largest political convention ever held in this country and also one of the stormiest, for it is by no means certain that it will simply meet, accept the Democratic candidates and then adjourn, as seemed probable a week ago. The Populists of the South, who have suffered much from Southern Democrats, and fought them for years, are not favoring a course of action which would result in destroying the Populist machine in the South. Senator Teller of Colorado has indorsed Mr. Bryan and the other Western silver Republicans and Populists stand ready to, realizing that a union of all friends of free silver in support of Mr. Bryan is necessary to give him a chance of winning.

Not a Race Issue.

Mr. T. Thomas Fortune, as able and well-known an Afro-American journalist as we have, calls attention to a significant aspect of the political campaign, now opening, which deserves consideration, i. e., that the "issues growing out of slavery are no longer a question to vex men's souls." He affirms that all the supplementary legislation based upon the war amendments has been swept away by the Supreme Court, and therefore he advises his fellow Afro-American citizens to appreciate the significance of the fact as soon as possible and realize that their own future depends upon their own efforts and not the pledges of any party or the laws of Congress or interpretations of the Constitution by judges of the Supreme Court. Or, as he puts it, "the idea that the Federal Congress can legalize the Afro-American into a man capable of forcing respect for his political and other rights is a dead issue. The American people no longer enthuse over it. They have reached the conclusion that the man and brother must look out for himself under the constitution of the State under which he is a citizen, just as they do. It will be a hard lesson for him to learn, but, as he must learn it, the sooner he buckles down to the job the better for him." It is apparent that if this be so, and the Afro-Americans of the South accept it as the truth, then their votes hereafter will not be so exclusively the property of the Republican party, and they will prove important factors in the process of disintegration and realignment which the South is to witness during the next few months. Nor would it be surprising to find them casting in their lot with the faction of the Democracy which their old masters dominate, rather than obeying the commands of men like Mr. Tillman, who is a typical product of the long oppressed and much despised "poor white trash."

The United States and the Porte.

From time to time we have deemed it necessary to express our dissatisfaction with the attitude of our officials toward American citizens engaged in missionary work in Turkey, and we have not hesitated to call for a new national representative in Constantinople and more resolution and dispatch at the State Department in Washington, hence we are not at all disposed to grieve because the Christian Endeavorers assembled in Washington were summoned to consider the question of the responsibility and duty of the United States toward suffering Armenia, and persecuted and pillaged American missionaries and missions in Turkey. But it would have been better if Rev. B. Fay Mills, the evangelist, who was one of three speakers put forth to discuss this question, could have shown more discretion and discrimination and refrained from impugning motives and playing on the passions of the susceptible auditors gathered to hear him. We do not believe that either President Cleveland, Secretary Olney or Minister Terrell are "unpatriotic, uncivil, un-American, un Christian, selfish, weak, wicked, barbaric and criminal," nor do those who applauded Mr. Mills now that they have had time to realize just what his wrath led him to say. Mr. Mills in expressing such views does not voice the opinions of the officials of the missionary society which is most concerned, nor does he reflect the opinion of the committee of laymen who visited the President and Secretary Olney recently. Such vituperation postpones, rather than hastens, such action as Mr. Mills longs for, and brings into disrepute the one who utters it and those who applaud.

The situation in Turkey grows more complex and massacres in Armenia have been renewed. The danger along the Macedonian border is such that the Turkish reserves have been called out. In Crete the Turkish troops, disregarding the recent armistice, have taken to pillaging and ravishing, while the Christian deputies to the Cretan Assembly have withdrawn from it to await the answer of the Porte to their demands before calling on their compatriots to resort to arms. The government of Greece recognizes that it cannot much longer restrain its citizens from going to aid their Christian brethren in Crete; and the Powers begin to realize that, unless they speedily intervene, a sanguinary contest full of danger to the maintenance of the peace of Europe will begin. The temper of the people of Great Britain is such that they will not tolerate a ministry that will permit a repetition in Crete of the horrors of Armenia.

William Eustis Russell.

Massachusetts, ever prolific in great and good men and rich as she is, cannot but feel bereft and impoverished when within so brief a cycle such men as Governor Greenhalge and ex Gov. William E. Russell pass away in their prime and at a time when State and nation so sorely need men of their courage, ability and breadth of vision. The sudden death of ex Gov. William E. Russell, last week, while sleeping in a far-distant Canadian fishing camp, has shocked and saddened the thousands who had honored him with their suffrages and their personal respect and trust, and it has been deplored by statesmen throughout the country, who realized that the young publicist had behind him a matchless political record and in him greatest capacities for service to his party and his country. The son of Charles Theodore Russell—the eminent lawyer—born in Cambridge, Jan. 6, 1857, educated in the public schools of his native city, at Harvard and the Boston University Law School, he began his public career in 1881 as a city father of Cambridge. From 1885 to 1888 he served acceptably as mayor of Cambridge. Defeated in 1888 and '89 as the Democratic candidate for governor of Massachusetts, in 1890, '91 and '92 he won, scoring one of the most remarkable personal victories ever known in American politics and attracting the attention of the nation. Since 1893 he has devoted his time assiduously to the practice of his profession and to writing contributions for the leading monthly reviews on aspects of our national political life. His last public utterance was a noble plea at the Chicago Democratic national convention for the perpetuity of party and national ideals and standards which he felt that the majority of that convention were about to ignore. He returned to his home not only weary in body and mind, but chagrined, mortified, heart-broken, and there will always be those who will believe that had the Chicago convention done other than it did the life of as high-minded and able a leader as the Democratic party ever had would have been prolonged to a normal limit. As we write this his body lies in state in the Cambridge City Hall. His funeral, held in the church which his father loved and which he attended, the Shepard Memorial, was exceedingly impressive and a striking tribute to the high estimate placed by men of affairs upon the life and example of the dead. President Cleveland and Chief-Justice Fuller of the Supreme Court represented the nation, and the commonwealth of Massachusetts sent its highest officials and a guard of the State militia.

Anglo-American Arbitration Tribunal.

Lord Salisbury, in a carefully guarded but conciliatory speech, last week, laid before the British peers some of the correspondence between Great Britain and the United States respecting the creation and maintenance of a permanent tribunal for the arbitration of questions that hitherto have been and now are subject to diplomacy's persuasive art or the sterner arbitrament of war. Concurrently the same correspondence was made public by our Department of State, and today the text of the lengthy communications between Lord Salisbury and Mr. Olney are subject to the calm, searching scrutiny of the editors and electors of both great nations. The correspondence made public terminated June 23, but it is understood that since that date the protagonists have come much closer together in agreement on details, hence it may be possible to be even more optimistic than would be warranted by a reading of the documents published last week. But a reading of those makes it clear that a great step forward has been taken. The temper of the communications is vastly different from those which passed between the two men late in 1895. Lord Salisbury practically concedes our right to hold and enforce the Monroe Doctrine. Both statesmen agree in supporting the ethical principle which underlies the demand for putting an end to the possibility of a war between Great Britain and the United States, and Mr. Olney has gone much farther than Lord Salisbury in conceding the authority of such a tribunal to settle even questions involving national honor, although he would first let Congress and Parliament determine whether any given issue does involve national honor. From the first he has resolutely insisted that the boundary dispute between Venezuela and Great Britain, which the United States has to a degree made its own, must come within the purview of the new tribunal. Lord Salisbury's hint that Great Britain will accept the verdict of our Venezuela Commission whether adverse or favorable, and the fact that he places more emphasis on securing justice for British settlers than on possessing disputed territory, all point to an amicable settlement of this phase of the question. If by autumn Lord Salisbury and Mr. Olney can report to their governments the draft of a treaty, however imperfect or in need of subsequent revision, that will bind the two leading nations of the world to keep the peace forever, they will cover themselves and their administrations with glory, and hasten the coming of the kingdom of God.

NOTES.

Costa Rica has decided to adopt the gold standard.

The recent Belgian elections strengthened the clerical majority in the national legislature.

Queen Victoria is to arbitrate a boundary dispute between Chile and the Argentine Republic.

Li Hung Chang is to be the guest of Great Britain, and later of the United States, as he journeys westward and homeward.

President Faure of France went to the races last week and became the target at which a crank or an enthusiast pointed and fired a revolver.

The decision of Mr. Thomas B. Reed of Maine to re-enter Congress means that he will lead the Republican forces in the next session of Congress and serve his country as well.

The new Canadian premier, Wilfrid Laurier, has named men of much experience in federal and provincial affairs as members of his cabinet, and confounded his enemies by his success in surrounding himself with strong men and at the same time avoiding personal, racial and sectional jealousies.

Important amendments to the Irish Land Bill, introduced at the instigation of Ulster landlords, have been subjected to such adverse criticism by men within the ministry's ranks that the bill as a whole, like the Education Bill, will be withdrawn for this session, and thereby add another failure to the sad record of the ministry which went into power with an "unprecedented majority."

Curtius, the German Hellenist and classical scholar; Novello, the English musician and publisher of music; Luther Whiting Mason, the American musician and instructor; William E Russell, the Massachusetts statesman; Arthur Cleveland Coxe, the eminent Protestant Episcopal hymn writer, bishop and controversialist; and W. Hamilton Gibson, the American artist and interpreter of nature, are among the notable dead of the week.

If it be true that the government of Zanzibar, yielding to the pressure of public and official opinion in Great Britain, has decided to abolish, at an early day, the legal status of slavery in Zanzibar, then a blot on the escutcheon of Great Britain is about to be removed. The commissioner of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society reported last year that nearly 250,000 slaves were then held in Zanzibar and Pemba, and that the places of those who died were constantly being taken by those captured or purchased on the African continent.

Fortunately the sensational news item from Kansas sent forth, last week, asserting that, as a result of a decision just made by the Court of Appeals of that State, 35,000 decrees of divorce granted in the State during the past quarter of a century would be made of noneffect, proves to be without basis of fact. The decision in question seems now to be one affecting only the case in question, and though a certain law is declared unconstitutional the very fact that its unconstitutionality is based on a technical imperfection would, if for no other reason, make it impossible that courts and people should let it cause any such uprooting and overturning of marital and property interests as was hinted at in the news dispatch first sent forth.

IN BRIEF.

Three of London's leading Congregational pastors were once Wesleyans—Rev. Messrs. Dawson, Harwood and Westrope. It is not in this country alone that our polity exercises a magnetic influence upon men of the Methodist persuasion.

The mingling of hope and fear with which the earnest Christians in the country and seaside resorts view the annual irruption of city people was expressed concisely in this petition of one of the natives, "O Lord bless the summer boarders and may they be blessings and not curses to us."

Mr. Gladstone keeps sweet under the criticism of his former and present admirers who object to his recent letter to the pope. He has a "strong belief that when the terms of his letter are sufficiently considered it will be seen that it condemns no one, disparages no one, but proceeds upon the principle that the more we are enabled conscientiously to acknowledge the possession of truths by our fellow-Christians the better it will be for the cause of our common Christianity."

There are not wanting those at this time of year who complain that "it is too hot to go to church!" Most unprejudiced minds will agree that there are few cooler places than the spacious interiors of most houses of worship, with their long rows of open windows and softly shaded lights. If, in addition to this, the listener has chosen for his "Sunday-go-to-meetin' clothes" something as thin, light and roomy as he wears on the other six days of the week, which surely ought to be possible in this free country and enlightened age, it seems to us there is little ground for complaint.

Now that Mr. Smith has passed away, there remain in the Congregational House only ten who came here as members of the circle of actual official workers, other than directors, when the denomination took possession of the house in 1873. These ten are: Mr. Chapin, Mr. Lovett and Miss Marden with the American Board: Miss Child with the Woman's Board; Mr. Waldron with the City Missionary Society; Miss Stone in the library; Mr. Todd and Mr. Snell in the printing office; Mr. Greene and Mr. Hames with The Congregationalist. While there are several now in office who were directors of different societies at that time, the association which owns the house now retains upon its board but one member, viz., Dr. Quint.

We respectfully commend to the editor of the Toronto World, who says "Great Britain need no longer lose any sleep over the threats of Americans; they carry within themselves the germs of self-destruction; the republic is honeycombed with pestilential microbes; within twenty years we may see the octopus split into two or even three republics, etc," the observation of Mr. John Stuart Mill that the American people have frequently seemed to be about to dash over the precipice, but always halted this side the edge of the cliff. Of course it would be folly to claim immortality for the United States because it is a republic and not a constitutional monarchy, but the republic is far from moribund or sick unto death.

Brigadier Brewer and his wife, who have been in charge of the Salvation Army in New England during the last seven years, have been ordered to the Northwest with headquarters at Chicago. Their friends last week gave them a reception in Lorimer Hall, Tremont Temple. We desire to recognize the tact, pertinacity and sense which Brigadier Brewer has shown while in charge of the army in New England. The number of corps has increased from seventeen to thirty-three, the number of officers from seventeen to 150 and there are now over 2,000 privates enlisted. Seven years ago the army in New England was burdened with debt and the annual income was only $2,000. Now there is a cash balance in the treasury, and the annual income is $33,000. This record testifies to Brigadier Brewer's executive ability and character.

So thoroughly has Rev. W. W. Jubb of Fall River, since coming to this country from England five years ago, identified himself with the denomination that there are many among us who will hope that his resignation of the pastorate of the Central Church in that city, at the end of the term of service marked out in advance, will not be the occasion of his withdrawal from this country. American Congregationalism needs every now and then an injection of ruddy English blood, and few men embody in their personalities more of the sturdy independence and forceful energy which we associate with our brethren on the other side of the sea than does Mr. Jubb. His exceptional ability as a preacher has made him welcome in our leading pulpits. He sails this week to fulfill preaching engagements in London and elsewhere and expects to return to this country in the autumn.

Secretary Ryder of the A. M. A. does well to tilt his lance against Editor Godkin of the New York Evening Post and all others who are indulging in sneers and contempt for the honesty and intelligence of citizens of the United States who happen to reside South and West. He says:

> It is not the truest patriotism that prompts such articles. We need to promote unity and not discord and dissension. The discussion of these great national questions ought to be lifted above bitterness and sectional strife as much as possible. The West is just as loyal as the East, and the country has one common interest and not a multitude of petty interests to be promoted by the narrow sectionalism of the East or the West.

Dr. Ryder's recent trip through the South enables him to report that the movement for free silver there is "both encouraging and discouraging. It is encouraging in that it promises to break up the solid South, made solid heretofore along race lines and prejudices. It introduces a new element and makes important to the dominant white race of the South the protection of the ballot to all voters."

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM NEW YORK.

Two Kinds of Summer Vacation.

No room is left for doubt that the summer vacation season is here in both cities. The fashionable riders are no longer seen in Central or Prospect Park. They leave the roads all the clearer for the sensible people who ride in the park wagons for twenty-five cents, and for bicyclers, who get lots of chances to do a little "scorching" on their own account. In the absence of the butterflies the busy bees are all the busier at their summer ministries to the poor and sick. The fresh air workers are livelier than ever, the Tribune band having already collected over $12,000 this season and is sending out parties of from 100 to 300 every few days. The Christian Herald people are not far behind, their throngs of young candidates for a week or two of fresh air and green grass fill the Bible House corridors with boy and girl music on each excursion day as it comes. The St. John's Guild's floating hospital has resumed its daily trips about the harbor and rivers full freighted with sick babies and their mothers, with a physician and skilled nurses on every boat to see that the most is made of the opportunity for recruiting the little ones. There is no doubt that many lives are yearly saved by the process. Many other less prominent newspaper, church, guild, settlement, club and personal excursion enterprises are giving to thousands of poor children and weary mothers a precious yearly outing.

Meanwhile, ever faithful bands of the Lord's servants, rich and poor, with their yearly increasing quota of emulators, are climbing to the top floors of tenement houses bearing food, medicines, delicacies, and speaking words of comfort to the sick and lonely who cannot get away into God's open air. The outside world knows little of their Christlike beneficence, but their Lord sees and will remember it.

A new and admirable feature of the Seaside Homes movement of the association for improving the condition of the poor is the blending with the children's pleasure and rest practical instruction in housekeeping work. An expert in food economy gives the theoretic teaching, and the young girls are taken to the butchers and grocers and taught how to buy most profitably. Then in the kitchen they are shown how to make the best use of their material.

Another (the third) American pilgrimage from this city to Rome and the "shrine of Our Lady" in Lourdes, France, sailed recently on the Westernland for Antwerp. It was the second section of a party the first section of which sailed in June. This second party before sailing attended mass in the French Catholic church in Twenty-third Street and obtained priestly blessing for American silk flags, one of which is to be given to the pope and the other to the Lourdes chapel. Most of the pilgrims were from this vicinity, but Canada, North Dakota, Maryland, Missouri, Iowa, Louisiana, Illinois, Texas, and other States were represented.

A Terror Still to Evildoers.

Anthony Comstock is still making himself "a second conscience" to all sorts of lawbreakers hereabouts. His latest onset was upon a nest of gambling houses in Long Island City, the bailiwick of Mayor Pat Gleason, who is the reputed owner of one of the gambling resorts, from which the assaulting party, after battering in the doors and searching the rooms and the roof, brought away several thousand dollars' worth of implements of the trade. Another of the haunts was kept by an alderman who was arrested with seven of his victims. Mr. Comstock in this raid had the legal and moral aid of Governor Morton, and, acting independently of Gleason's police, was able to "get there" ahead of the notice of his coming which has so often frustrated his attempts. But the worst remains to be told —his resort to a trick for which, as often heretofore, he will be berated by a certain class of official and newspaper moralists. Having some distance to go with his party, Mr. Comstock hired carriages, and one of the holes being near a cemetery, instead of raising a banner inscribed, "I am Comstock coming to raid Alderman Kane's hole," the wily deceiver had the carriages slowly and solemnly driven, as if in funeral procession, until they reached their goal and with heavy hammers gained entrance. Bad man! It now remains to be seen whether the criminals will be released on the ground that they were "the victims of duplicity."

Personals.

The Shelter Island clerical contingent has gathered in their summer homes, and "Divinity Hill" puts on anew its dignity in the presence of such men as Drs. Storrs, Coe, Behrends and the rest—not omitting the famous Angora cat of the Behrends household, one of the most beautiful and learned of her tribe, proficient in several feline languages and, from much frequenting of the doctor's study, better versed in philosophy than are many bipeds of far more pretentious claims. Particularly watchful of all approaches to the quiet home, her free use of the Sanscrit on the approach of a tramp, and her scornful attitude and scathing remarks on the appearance of a passing bicycler whose costume fails to satisfy her views of propriety are worth going far to hear and see.

Dr. Meredith spends most of July and August at his summer home on Long Island, and his pulpit will be supplied by Dr. S. E. Herrick of Boston. Dr. M. M. G. Dana is preaching to the united congregations of the Church of the Pilgrims, the Reformed Church on the Heights and the First and Second Presbyterian. Later he is to minister to the South Church people, Dr. A. J. Lyman's.

Dr. McElveen's people of the New England Church introduced a new feature at a reception tendered him by his parishioners and friends. Each of the participants was desired to wear his or her visiting card conspicuously attached to the dress that the new pastor and wife might the more readily come to associate the name with the face of the wearer.

On the Sabbath before leaving for his vacation Dr. Virgin had the privilege of welcoming to Pilgrim Church eleven new members, making forty-six received since Jan. 1, and carrying up the membership to more than 760. At the preceding communion two more Chinamen from his Sunday school were received into the church on confession and baptism.

HUNTINGTON.

FROM THE INTERIOR.

In the death of Isaac N. Camp, Esq., of the firm Estey & Camp, organs and pianos, the city of Chicago, the State and church are alike bereft. A Vermonter by birth, a graduate of the University of Vermont, a prominent member of the Union Park Church, of the Congregational Club of Chicago, of the Union League, one of the commissioners of the World's Fair, intensely interested in all that concerned the welfare of the city, the country and the kingdom of God, successful in business, a generous giver to all good objects, a kind and loving husband, a father who watched the course of his children with the deepest anxiety and rejoiced in their prosperity, wise in counsel, a sympathetic friend, it is hard to think of a man who will be more missed in business and church circles than Mr. Camp. He was about sixty-five years of age and died suddenly, of neuralgia of the stomach, at his summer residence at Williamsburg, Geneva Lake, Sunday, July 12. He leaves a wife, who has long been an invalid, and three children, one daughter, Mrs. Farr, and two sons. He has been a tower of strength in Union Park Church and one of Dr. Noble's most intelligent and loyal supporters. For seven years he was principal of the Burlington, Vt., high school. Mr. Camp has been a very efficient member of our Sunday school committee for the West. To his family we extend our sincerest sympathy in the sorrow which has thus unexpectedly come upon them.

School of Charities.

Among the various summer schools few will be more useful in the vicinity than the School for Charities, which is carried on under the direction of Dr. Philip W. Ayres of the Chicago Bureau of Charities. Associated with him are teachers of eminence and experience both from the East and the West. The plan is to assign the pupil a section of the city, or some form of distress or need, and require him to study it independently of any theories on the subject. The number of persons already engaged in this study indicates the interest there is in it and a determination to discover, if possible, some practical solution for the problems of poverty. Dr. Ayres is well fitted to be at the head of the school. The enthusiasm which he himself has in the study of the problems of charity naturally is imparted to those who come in contact with him day by day.

Hold Ups and Bandits.

A few days ago the Tribune published a list of eighteen stores and private individuals robbed within two months. Since that time the list has been increased by three or four, one of the last persons to be robbed being the agent at one of the stations on the Metropolitan Elevated Railway. It begins to look as if the police were inefficient, to say the least, and as if there were need of applying the Civil Service test to this department with even more strictness than has as yet been advocated. It is not without significance that a policeman is now on trial for being discovered asleep in bed and partially, if not wholly, drunk when he ought to have been on his beat. It is good news, which we trust will be confirmed, that the police have at last caught the men who have raided so many of our stores and robbed so many individuals. Reports have been that two persons were engaged in this work, a long man and a short one. The short man has made a clean breast of it, confesses his own guilt and implicates his companion. If they prove to be the culprits, the severest possible penalty will be inflicted on them.

The Drainage Canal.

This great work is approaching completion. A recent visit only serves to deepen a sense of its importance to the city of Chicago and possibly to the commerce of the Northwest. Only about fifteen per cent. of the work is uncompleted. Those who wish to see the machinery used in excavating and in removing solid rock ought to lose no time in doing so. The finished sections of the canal have too much water in them to admit of visits. It is still possible to see the evidence of glacier movement and to study the relation of glaciers, which met at what is now known as the junction of the Des Plaines and Sag valleys. The rock which excavation has laid bare is covered with striæ, which seem to show conclusively the direction of these glaciers and to prove that these valleys were formed by them. Professor Ford, principal of the Calhoun School, an enthusiast in the study of geology, has collected a vast amount of evidence to establish the theory named above. He has also saved a good many specimens which geological museums ought not to be slow in examining. It is thought that in a year from this time the canal will be ready for use. There may be some delay in making the proper connection between this immense channel—twenty-eight miles in length, one hundred and sixty feet in width, planned to have a depth of water varying from twenty-two to twenty-six feet —and the present sewage system of the city. But it looks as if the connection could easily be made and just as soon as money can be obtained to meet the cost of making it. That, we hope, will solve our question of drainage for all time. With a current of fresh water running through the canal from the lake, persons living on its banks ought not to be annoyed by the uses to which it is to be put. The cost has been estimated at about $28,000,000. This does not include the cost of changes which the city must make before it will be available—probably five or six millions more.

FRANKLIN.

Some of the Causes of the Present Unrest.

By Rev. W. G. Puddefoot.

One of the causes of the present dullness of trade is a lack of confidence. This has caused every one to be more careful in expenditures. An average of fifty cents a week saved by cautious people means many millions of dollars a week drawn from trade. The man who was going to shingle his house now patches it, he who would paint under ordinary circumstances lets it go another year, men wear their clothes longer and the boots are repaired that were formerly given to the tramp. Carry out this economy in all departments of life and we have a difference in the business of seventy millions of people that amounts to hundreds of millions of dollars, so that the result of hard times makes times harder.

We are living in a most anomalous condition. Israel cried out for lack of corn and goes to Egypt, but here is a people crying out because of fullness of bread. What would Malthus say if he were alive? Here we have a nation getting rich at the rate of seven million dollars a day, shipping on an average eight hundred million dollars worth of products a year and having over a million bushels of wheat on hand of last year's crop that it cannot consume, and making a cry of hard times before the whole world! Good old times are myths. Our newspapers allude to them for political effect, but read the file of papers for years back you will find the same cry, the same unrest, the same epidemic of crime, suicide, etc. In fact, certain things have become so stereotyped that the type might be kept standing. I do not deny that times are hard but I have seen them much worse and I know that long before my time they were as much worse as one could imagine. Before the advent of steam whole communities literally starved when others had more than they could use but had no means for saving what they had and no way of distribution. The railway, the steamship and the telegraph have stopped those troubles but, alas, they have brought a new train of ills.

In fact, it is the constant and rapid change of economic conditions that has brought the present crisis upon us. The farmer especially cries out today at the low prices he gets for his produce. The consumer cries because of the high price. Both producer and consumer are amazed, for never was there a greater contrast between the first cost and the last price—the low price of wheat and the high price of bread. In other lands the bread is weighed, and if not up to the four pounds a piece is cut off from another loaf until it is made good. But the loaf handed out for ten cents today is no larger than when wheat was two dollars a bushel. The farmer sighs as he sees his fat steers driven off for a few cents a pound; the consumer wonders when the butcher asks him twenty-five cents a pound, knowing that the cost of carriage has been reduced to a minimum. The consumer is still more surprised if he goes to England and finds prime beef from Kansas cattle from five to ten cents less per pound than he can buy it in Boston, and flour made in Minneapolis cheaper in Liverpool than New York.

Now, in order to understand the present conditions, let us review a few of the causes that produced them. Take the farmer at the beginning of the century; his tools are plows, hoes, rakes, sickles and flails. The whole season is full from spring plowing to the winter threshing. Now mark the changes: first, the sickle gives way to the cradle; the cradle has hardly become common when a mowing and reaping machine appears; then the combined machine; then a machine that binds. But a great strife is gendered between the makers of twine and wire; this leads to the invention of a machine which makes its own bands out of the straw that it is cutting. The old plow gives way to a sulky plow. The gang plow supersedes it. The threshing machine finishes in a few hours what once took the winter.

In the manufacturing world machines have been made one of which will do the work of 1,000 men! Evidently, 999 men must go elsewhere. A ton of merchandise is carried a mile for less than a cent. Triple compound engines are made for the great steamships, so that the adding of half a page of this paper to the furnace fire will carry a ton of goods a mile on the ocean. From the plowman, therefore, up to the thresher on the farm, and from the carrier in his cumbrous wagon to the transatlantic steamer, revolutions have been made that have completely upset all previous conditions. In short, we have today in the steam power, which includes all others up to date, a producer prolific enough to supply two worlds. The supply is too great for the demand. I do not say that the supply is too great for the need. If some great mind could show how the millions of needy in the world could get in an honest way some of the great surplus it would hasten the millennium.

One thing, however, is sure. The way is not that advocated today by so many in the West and South. The cry for free silver is with millions an honest delusion. Drowning men catch at straws but no man was ever saved from drowning in that way, and the thousands who are sinking today will only go deeper into poverty should they obtain their desires. There cannot be free silver any more than free gold. There is only one really free thing on earth and that is air, and even that is sometimes adulterated.

In my travels in the South and West nothing has surprised me so much as the abundance of silver, and where they cry the loudest for free silver is where you are given the most silver in exchange for your bill. So intense is the desire for unlimited coinage of silver that strangers would open a conversation with me upon the subject in the most direct, and often rude, way. "Have you read Coin's Financial School?" would be thrown at me almost savagely. I bought the book and was more surprised than ever how such superficial arguments could bewitch an otherwise wide-awake people—how people could be made to believe that in a room in England two or three men could buy up the United States Senate.

Our newspapers, with few exceptions, of both parties are responsible for such a condition of mind. This state of confusion was not confined to the poor farmer and laborer, but ministers above all others seemed to be as deluded as any. I asked one prominent minister how was it possible for a Christian man to countenance such a fraud. He replied, to my astonishment, "Do you think free silver would hurt you Eastern people any more than your gold is hurting us?" I said, "Why don't you go back to cowrie shells?" After talking with all sorts and conditions of men both in the East and the West I am sure of one thing—that there is a profound ignorance on the silver question on the part of millions of misguided men and a depth of depravity and wicked avariciousness on the part of some who know better that is hard to match in all history. It seems to me little short of a crime for the Secretary of the Treasury to begin coining silver at the rate of $3,000,000 a month when there are hundreds of millions already in the mints that cannot be got into circulation. The tampering with principles for the sake of partisanship is a curse that must be shaken off. The conditions of the West and South, and to some extent the East, are the natural and inevitable outcome of placing policy above principle. Had the church been as active in sending the gospel to the West as she has been in placing investments of an earthly nature there, we should not be so troubled today on questions which are matters of honesty.

Men ought surely to know that to make it possible for men who own silver to go to the United States mint with less than ten dollars worth of silver and bring away over eighteen dollars in coin is to make it possible for the silver owner to rob the Government of over eight dollars, which is nothing less than robbing the people, and how these people who do not own any silver can believe that they can become richer by being thus robbed is a worse enigma to solve than any the Sphinx ever gave. The lower the condition of a race the poorer their money, so we advance from savagery, with its cowrie shell currency, all the way up through iron and bronze to gold.

I deeply sympathize with the poor farmers of our great prairies. Thousands of them reached their land with hardly enough to pay the freight on their household goods. In some cases they had to leave part of their furniture to pay for the carriage. Thousands are living today on flour, milk and a few eggs. Their wants are many and could they be satisfied would make every industry start afresh, but should they have their way that which they now suffer would be intensified beyond precedent in this country. On the other hand, should honest money become victorious untold millions lie over the water ready to be invested in this new world. That would do more for our prosperity than any other one thing. Let confidence be restored and the silver and the gold shall be ours, but, better than all, we shall have a clear conscience.

Superintendent Aldridge of New York State's Department of Public Works has issued orders forbidding the custodians of the gatehouses, which guard the exits of the lakes that feed the canals, to keep or sell ale, beer or alcoholic liquors of any kind, nor will he longer permit the gatehouses to be lounging places for sportsmen, poachers and State employés.

Pilgrimage Letters.

Dr. John Brown and the Home of Bunyan. At the Priory, Reigate, with Lady Henry Somerset.

A fairer June morning never dawned than the one when "the Pilgrim Fathers," as our party is now popularly called, turned their faces toward the shrine of Bunyan in the town of Bedford. We were met at the station by Mr. Greatheart in the person of Dr. John Brown, author of the delightful new Life of the tinker preacher, and a few other friends, who accompanied us first to the little village of Elstow, where Bunyan was born in 1628. Those who remembered the illustrated sketch of the immortal dreamer in The Congregationalist of April 30 recognized the quaint little cottage whither he took his young bride, "not having so much household stuff as a dish or a spoon betwixt them both," and where he carried on his trade. Not far beyond is the village green, probably the scene of Vanity Fair, and on this stands the curious old structure known as the Moot Hall. The whole estate was once a royal manor and this hall the court house where tenants under the crown came to pay their fines. The upper part is now used as a chapel and schoolhouse, where services are maintained by the Bunyan Meeting of Bedford, of which Dr. Brown has been pastor for thirty-two years.

As we climbed the worn steps of the steep, narrow stairway and entered the ancient hall where Bunyan's voice had sounded two and a half centuries ago, a beautiful scene presented itself. The ladies of the parish had tastefully festooned the heavy oaken beams and rafters with delicate green vines and wild-flowers and loaded tables with heaping baskets of great luscious strawberries and other food, to which we did ample justice though it was less than three hours since breakfast. Happening to discover that it was the birthday of our genial host, three rousing cheers were given in his honor and after the meal he held us spellbound with a charming address on the romance and history of the neighborhood. He related an amusing anecdote of a person who once mistook him for the author of Pilgrim's Progress and asked if he had written any books since that!

A visit to the parish church followed. The fine Norman arches still remain of the original edifice, which is surrounded by picturesque, ivy-covered ruins of the old monastic buildings. The house of the abbey must have been new when Bunyan was a boy and altogether the most imposing he had ever beheld. He would see it plainly as he came across the fields to church, and undoubtedly this suggested the idea of his House Beautiful, which is described in the Progress as a little apart from the wayside. As we traversed this very pathway, the June sunlight flecking the meadows wherein sheep were quietly grazing, and listened to the inspiring words of our Greatheart, we seemed to be on the Delectable Mountains and could almost see

> Over the river and in at the gate,
> Where for weary pilgrims the angels wait.

Returning to Bedford another ovation awaited us in the lecture hall of Bunyan Meeting, where a bountiful repast was served and accompanied by the usual speech-making. The massive bronze doors of this edifice are quite as beautiful as those on the Baptistery at Florence, which Michael Angelo declared worthy to be the gates of Paradise. These consist of ten panels, illustrating scenes from the Progress, and were a gift from the Duke of Bedford at a cost of over $8,000. One panel represents Slothful and his companions resting on the ground in attitudes of indescribable laziness.

BUNYAN MEETING, BEDFORD.

Here, too, we saw many interesting relics, among them Bunyan's will and an old oaken door belonging originally to the county gaol in which he was imprisoned. Bedford is also famous for being the residence of the great philanthropist, John Howard, a statue of whom stands in one of the squares. It is a curious circumstance that of the twelve ministers who have served this church, which was founded in 1650, during the Commonwealth, seven have borne the cognomen of John. Howard's name is further immortalized by being attached to the church of which Rev. John Thompson is pastor, and the good people of this parish, not to be outdone by Dr. Brown, entertained us at afternoon tea in their pretty chapel, specially carpeted and furnished and charmingly decorated with flowers, and between whiles we passed an hour as the guests of the two Mrs. Rose in their lovely gardens. How the English do revel in flowers and how little the ordinary tourist knows of the beautiful home life that goes on behind the high brick walls. Among our pleasantest memories are the tea drinkings and social converse within those green bowers filled with the fragrance of roses. As Dr. Brown aptly remarked: "Such visits are the best of treaties, stronger than armaments, and perpetual sureties of peace between the two great English-speaking nations."

One of several unexpected pleasures on this enriching trip was an invitation to breakfast with Lady Henry Somerset at Reigate Priory. Plans for sight-seeing in London were gladly abandoned for this rare privilege, and an hour's ride from the city brought us to the historic spot. We were cordially welcomed by her ladyship, our own distinguished countrywoman, Miss Willard, and her secretary, Miss Gordon, in the grand entrance hall. After being escorted by them through several rooms on the ground floor, an elegant breakfast was served in the wainscoted dining-room, which opens by French windows on to the lawn, where stands the chapel in which Lady Henry conducts daily service for the household. The inscription over the doorway is copied from one on the Taj Mahal and reads: "This world is a bridge, pass thee over it but build not on it. This world is one hour, give its minutes to thy prayers for the rest is unseen." Three tables were required for our party, a large round one in the center magnificently decorated with La France roses, and two small ones at one side. After breakfast our gracious hostess again conducted us through the rest of the house and over the extensive grounds. The Priory is a perfect treasure house of rare old portraits, wood carvings, armor, statuary, plate, and all that goes with an inheritance of noble birth and great wealth.

The history of the place dates back to the days of Magna Charta, and it is believed that the prior and monks who helped the illiterate barons prepare that immortal document carried on the work in caves still to be seen near by. An ancient tithing barn, between four and five hundred years old, is preserved as an interesting relic, for here a tenth of the produce was brought by the farmers of the surrounding community to the monks as their portion. The place is also full of literary interest. Usher's famous Chronology was written at the Priory, where he died. He was afterward buried in Westminster Abbey. Not far off are the homes of George Meredith, the novelist, and Grant Allen, the brilliant essayist. Lady Henry inherits Reigate from her distinguished ancestor, Lord Somers, a marble bust of whom, in his official robes, stands at the great entrance to the House of Commons. He was the noblest and most influential patron of letters in his day.

But the place of all others which impressed us most, as Christian pilgrims, was when we stood with reverent feet beneath the tree where Lady Henry went through that deep spiritual experience which led to her separation from the world of fashion and her entrance upon the higher life of self-sacrificing service. The Voice which then whispered, "This is the way, walk ye in it," is still leading her up the hights of even larger usefulness in connection with her latest scheme, the Industrial Farm Home in Duxhurst. An estate of 180 acres as been secured near Reigate by the ritish W. C. T. U., where habitual women iebriates can be treated. There are six ettlements in all and to each is attached a mall hospital, a chapel, a children's home, eparate office buildings and a laundry. 'he women are expected to carry on the arious industries which have been organ-ed, such as the care of poultry, bee culture, oriculture, jam-making, fruit evaporation nd a limited amount of laundry and needle ork. There are little groups of cottages n each settlement and, believing that in-briety is a moral disease and to be treated s such, there are six patients in each cot-age under the care of an experienced nurse. 'his experiment in trying to check the in-rease of drunkenness among women is at-racting much attention in England and an ffort is being made to secure an appropria-ion from government for the farm colony.

As we find the most beautiful paintings and bjects of interest marked in our Baedekers ith two stars, so we of The Congregationalist Pilgrimage will place twin stars against he days at Bedford and Reigate. Our jour-ey has been illumined all the way with ignal tokens of the divine favor, but the adiance from these two centers of privilege hines forth with peculiar brilliancy.

SAINTS AS CITIZENS.

BY LEDYARD M. BAILEY, SALT LAKE CITY.

As citizens of what they term the king-om of God, or even according to their ights as citizens of the State of Utah, the nembers of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints are doubtless unexcep-ionable, but as citizens of the United States ome of them still leave much to be desired. When the church, in October, 1890, issued manifesto suspending the practice of po-ygamy and declaring that it would solemn-ze no more polygamous marriages, this tep, together with the consequent disband-ng of the People's party as a political fac-or, was intended to signify the recognition by the Mormon Church of the supremacy of the United States Government in tempo-al affairs and it was so accepted in good aith by most American citizens in Utah nd throughout the country. This suprem-cy once recognized, the obligation of duty o the State once acknowledged and the ractice of polygamy, as all good Ameri-ans hoped, practically ended, there was no onger any good reason for refusing State-ood to Utah—always providing the church would keep faith.

There were certain passages in the history of Utah which seemed to warrant a sturdy doubt on this point, but when such pledges were offered as no honorable men of any party or of any religion could refuse, when the "changed conditions" were made so obvious that it seemed childish prejudice to question them, the murmurings ceased and preparations for Statehood went gayly forward.

In the campaign for acceptance of the constitution and election of the first State officers, in the fall of 1895, charges were freely made by the Democrats, and backed by strong proofs, that the church was not keeping faith and that it was church influence and not political choice which guaranteed the victory which the Republicans won. There were also hints that polygamy was not extinct, but only unnoticed and that the manifesto was already proved either a failure or a humbug. But the Republicans laughed to scorn these charges and protests, calling them simply campaign lies and cheap efforts to stampede the people. In vain the Democratic leaders uttered solemn warnings, in vain they called the Republicans to witness that in due time they would in their turn experience the difference between running with and running against church influence. Statehood was in the air, the constitution carried by a vote of five to one, the Republican ticket was elected and forthwith the fiery protests died away into nothingness. On Jan. 4, 1896, President Cleveland announced that the constitution provided for "a republican form of government" and Utah became a sovereign State. The people of Utah had at last attained their long-hoped-for privilege of independent self-government, with their own State officers and their own State rights. By the use they have made thereof let them be judged before all men.

In March the legislature passed a bill to make legitimate all children of polygamous marriage born in Utah prior to Jan. 4, 1896. That this act recognized the continuance of the polygamous relations during all the years after they were solemnly suspended by the church, that it proved—since no one questions the power of the church—its utter lack of good faith in enforcing its own decree, that the sole reason for thus putting the church to shame before the nation was to relieve from the consequences of their own wrongdoing those men and women who had respected neither the law of their country nor the command of their church, all these pleas availed nothing to prevent the passage of the bill. What could be thought save that the manifesto had been interpreted to suit the cases of those whose "hearts could not change in a day," to quote the language of the governor in commending the bill?

But while men and women might be forgiven for not changing their hearts in a day, or even in five years, where their marriage relations were concerned, it soon became evident that those hearts were still unchanged in certain other particulars even more vital to American citizenship, particulars, too, in which the fact and the permanency of the change had been even more strongly asserted and more heartily credited. On the second day of the semi-annual conference of the church, during the first week in April, the authorities issued an address to the people, in which they laid down the principle that thenceforward no high official of the church should accept nomination to any political office which might interfere with his duties to the church, without first taking the advice and counsel of "those in authority."

This declaration had an ominous sound, but when it was noticed that Moses Thatcher, one of the most prominent of the twelve apostles and a Democratic candidate for the United States Senate in 1895, had not signed this address, and that his name had thereupon been dropped from the roll of officers submitted to the conference for indorsement, and when Mr. Thatcher published a letter giving as his reasen for refusing to sign his firm conviction that the rule laid down was not within the rightful authority of the church, then it began to be suspected that the brief reign of individual independence in politics was to be ended as it had been begun—by the edict of the church. Mr. Thatcher had been for many years a most faithful and honored servant of the church, he is a man alike beloved and respected by men of all parties, and he is suffering from a painful and probably fatal illness. But these things only serve to throw into higher relief the stern determination of the authorities.

And now appeared also the proof that the gift of prophecy is not vested exclusively in the church, for the bitter predictions of the Democratic victims of the last campaign were fulfilled to the letter. Scarcely had the legislature adjourned, in the second week of April, than one of the Republican leaders in the House, Edward B. Critchlow, chairman of the committee on judiciary, published letters in which he charged that the church authorities had appointed a committee or junta of six prominent church officials to give counsel and advice on matters of proposed legislation to their brethren in the legislature, and that such counsel and advice had been backed up by no less potent an argument than the threat of church discipline in case of contumacy.

Instantly a great shout of denial arose, in which those who had been accused were joined by others whose acts had not been questioned; but Mr. Critchlow stood by his statements, and brought forward proofs strong enough to discredit any denials save those of the church. It appeared also, from the denials themselves, that all of the gentlemen who had been named as members of the junta had felt it their duty to give advice and counsel on legislative matters to various members of the legislature, and that the first presidency of the church had referred seekers after light to these same gentlemen. This time the Republican ox had been gored, and his bellowing was quite as earnest and to quite as little purpose as had been his Democratic yokefellows' in the campaign of 1895.

The man in the street may be forgiven for beginning to suspect that the much-vaunted division on National party lines, the eager enlistment in opposing party organizations, the heated discussions of political policies, and all the highly-colored, brand new political freedom which has become the Mormon people so well during the past three years, that all this has waxed old like the most shoddy of garments, and that the original doctrine of the supremacy of the church in all the concerns of its people has never really relaxed its hold upon their hearts.

That this principle can continue to hold sway in the hearts and lives of a majority of the citizens of Utah no American can believe, because it is not to be believed that temporal power, founded upon ignorance and blind submission to priestly authority, can endure in this nation and in this age where never was such a foundation more perilous. In the meantime the sterling American citizenship of Utah, already tried in the fire, stands ready, if need be, to fight its good fight over again with the certainty of a more lasting victory. Nowhere in the United States today are the possibilities of material success and wealth and of political progress as tempting as in Utah, and no situation appeals more strongly to the energy, business enterprise and civic courage of young America.

It is a great moment in a man's experience when he awakens to the wonder of the world about him, and begins to see it with his own eyes and to feel afresh its subtle and penetrating charm.—H. W. Mabie.

THE SCARLET TANAGER.

BY ISAAC OGDEN RANKIN.

Never a ruby shone in staff, or crown,
Or on the slender finger of a queen,
With splendor like to thine among the green
Leaves of the lofty trees, against the brown
Of roughly furrowed trunks, or the blue heaven serene.

What doest thou here in thy barbaric state,
Black winged, scarlet robed? More fit for thee
Some palm-crowned island in a tropic sea,
Fanned by soft winds that wake in evenings late,
And moon-illumined flowers about thy nesting tree.

Not thine the changing note the mocking bird
Flings from his covert in pure joy of song,
The vesper sparrow's tender ditty, long
Through evening shadows from the thicket heard,
The thrush's chant at morn, the robin's carol strong.

"A harsh, untuneful note is thine," they say
Who hear thy call and pass unheeding by;
Nor see thy scarlet gleam against a sky
That not, at close of any stormy day,
In barred or broken cloud may hope with thee to vie.

Thou bearest the fiery heart of earth that yearns
In vain for utterance in the swaying trees,
Or the low murmur of the heedless breeze.
In thee, as in a sudden flame, it burns,
Like some volcano's fire above the sapphire seas.

Thou hast thy gift, like man, thou hast the gift
Of beauty, which can never bring content;
And, like the heart of man, in banishment
From loftiest joys, thou too a cry dost lift
To the deaf heaven, like brass above thy dwelling bent.

And yet since heaven, regardful of our state,
Made us for service, fling among the deep
Recesses of the boughs, where shadows sleep
All the long day, thy fires of joy, nor wait
For gift of song, nor idly thy one blessing keep!

Thou in thy robes, the mock bird in his glee,
Man with his brooding heart intent to guess
Life's meaning, all have gifts wherewith to bless;
And in their gift their loftiest joy shall be.
Not in perfection's calm were our best happiness.

An hour with thee, and the dull morn is bright,
Illumined with thy splendor everywhere.
And thy sole note is like a call to prayer
Following the organ's jubilee. The light
Falls through heaven's windows. Perfect life is there!

Letters of sympathy require the utmost tact and finest delicacy in order to say the fitting word in the way that will least wound. Ordinary expressions of sympathy seem too cold when put in black and white to send to one in the "aloofness of grief," to use Mrs. Sangster's phrase, and the poet Longfellow showed his fine feeling when he wrote to a friend in bereavement: "Words cannot reach such a grief. I can only press your hand in silence." Perhaps we are more often in danger of giving pain by saying too much than too little. Many a person who has suffered from this error will understand the shrinking of Maurice de Guérin when he said: "This letter, in touching my most sensitive wounds for the purpose of healing them, has set astir within me a vibration of all my heart's sufferings."

Carlyle calls the book of Job, "One of the grandest things ever written. There is nothing, I think, in the Bible or out of it, of equal literary merit." And again he writes: "David's life and history, as written for us in those Psalms of his, I consider to be the truest emblem ever given of a man's moral progress and warfare here below." When we find our boys and girls beginning to slight their Bible reading, seeming to think everything else of greater importance, it is well to call their attention to the way it has been regarded by the thinking men of all ages. In their youth and strength and overflowing spirits, they seldom feel the need of the spiritual consolation and uplifting which the Bible brings to their older friends, yet they ought not, in this time of self-sufficiency, to drift away from the good Book. If they chafe at the reading of it as a religious exercise, let them study it with an eye to discovering why others hold it in such high esteem, and the result cannot fail to be good.

"Why do not the women marry?" This question was discussed not long ago, in a serious and dignified manner, in the Atlanta Constitution, and some interesting facts were evolved in connection therewith. Naturally the query involves another which is equally pertinent, namely, why do not the men marry? It is impossible to reply to the one apart from the other. One reason assigned for the decrease of marriage is the congestion of population in the cities. This makes the struggle for life harder and deters men from assuming the responsibilities of married life. It is a curious fact, too, that in cities more female than male children are born. The urban population invariably produces an excess of women, while the rural population as regularly furnishes an excess of men. But the country boys drifting to the cities restore the equilibrium. The balance of the sexes is again disturbed, however, by emigration, for the majority of emigrants are men and they leave behind a majority of women. Another cause which operates against marriage is the large number of women who earn a good living for themselves, and their contact with the business world makes them judge a suitor in a practical light before they consider him as a sentimental possibility. Thus it will be seen that modern changes in social and industrial life have created disordered conditions which must be taken into account when analyzing the marriage problem.

THE ALOOFNESS OF GRIEF.

BY MRS. M. E. SANGSTER.

Our Lord was alone in Gethsemane. Then, as all through his earthly life, was fulfilled the word of the prophet that he was a Man of Sorrows and acquainted with grief. In those experiences of trial and suffering which come to his followers there is great comfort in the thought that he is aware of the loneliness and desolation of those who are led by grief into the wilderness, there to wrestle with the tempter, there to struggle or to bend beneath the pressing load, there to await the relief of heaven in the hour of utmost need.

We are often impressed anew as we sit in homes under the shadow with the aloofness of grief. It has a certain awesome dignity. Into the mystic circle which it draws about the sufferer no alien may intrude. Even friends and kindred walk softly and touch with gentlest care the hand of her whose whole being is absorbed in one intense yearning for that which has gone, in one baffled heartache over the mistakes of the past, in one agonized endurance of the conditions of the present. It seems strange that just beyond that hushed and darkened spot, where the mourner's slow tears fall, the world is going on just the same as it did before, with cheerful sounds of activity, the stir of business, the whirl of gayety, the comings and goings of eager and happy people not affected by the heartbreak which has set its seal on the bereaved. To them life is shorn for the moment of its usual interests, they feel stunned or benumbed, or else acutely alive to suffering in every vein and nerve, but the world does not care, and nature goes smilingly on in its procession of day and night as if nothing had happened.

The aloofness of grief, while it apparently adds to the intensity of its sadness, is really a blessing, for it surrounds the mourner with a sanctuary. As of old one in peril clung to the horns of the altar and was safe, so in the extremity of mortal pain and the bitterness of the anguish-cup the wounded heart is shut away from the world and shut in to heaven. At first the cloud is so dark that heaven itself hardly penetrates it, but by degrees there comes the rifting light. The voice that could not frame coherent petitions falters out its "O, my Father," and back through the gloom, thrillingly, tenderly, returns the answer, "Here, my child." Bit by bit faith resumes its control, never lost, but perhaps for a little while shaken, and the promises, one by one, rise and glow, like stars in the firmament.

One can do little for friends in deep sorrow by the way of direct counsel; spoken comfort is inadequate. The ordinary consolations, accepted in ordinary times, fall on deaf ears. To love one's own, to cling to them, to feel with them, to pray for them, is the most that sympathetic and affectionate friends can do in the hour of the aloofness of grief.

Friends and relatives do not always see this necessity of letting the grief stricken remain in the sanctuary. With well-meant, but clumsy, endeavors they force food on those who are not hungry and drink on those who are not athirst. They speak of recreation to those who can think of nothing beyond the desert place in which they must abide till the tender Shepherd himself find them and lead them into the light. It would be better in most cases to forbear attempts which do little good, and to wait with patience for the healing touch of time and the return of healthy life and vigor. These come when God has done what the sorrow was sent for, and from the sorrow's hour of darkness the sufferer arises, stronger to comfort others, with a new experience of the divine love, and sometimes with a revelation, never forgotten, of the nearness of heaven to earth.

TWO "EMANCIPATED WOMEN."

BY IDA E. KITTREDGE.

"Ah, this is living! At last I am free—free!"

These words were uttered, not by a bicyclist in bloomers, a lecturer on politics, or any other of the monstrosities known as "the new woman," but by a bright-faced spinster engaged in the prosaic occupation of farming. Within two miles of a New England capital city stands a low yellow farmhouse surrounded by thirty acres of highly cultivated land. Here two single women, long devoted friends—one a college graduate, whose health was wrecked by study and teaching, the other a musician—live by themselves, carry on the farm and earn a modest income by supplying the city market with flowers, small fruits and vegetables.

On the morning referred to we found the house deserted. A shaggy Newfoundland dog came bounding to meet us, with wagging tail and other friendly demonstrations. This welcome to utter strangers his mistress explained later: "O, Duke discriminates—he never barks at petticoats." The air was heavy with the fragrance of roses, mingled with the spicy breath of pines. A vigorous double-knock bringing no response, we walked down a path blazing with fluffy poppies—single, double, pink, white, salmon, glowing scarlet, deepest red, even yellow. Farther on were beds of pansies and violets, columbines and bachelor's buttons, gaillardia and sweet sultan, while still beyond, stretching away farther than eye could reach, were fields of corn, peas, strawberries, asparagus, onions, lettuce, etc. We were just slipping our cards under the door when a small boy appeared around the corner of the barn.

"Miss Winsor?" he repeated, in response to our inquiry, "O, she's gone to the city—won't be home for half an hour. But Miss Mansfield's to home—she's down in the field picking peas."

We followed meekly as he trotted back, settling down in his place among the peavines with the accuracy of a hand organ after a break in its threnody. Here a company of boys were industriously picking peas under the direction of a slender woman, who came forward hospitably as we approached the fence.

"Miss Winsor's friends?" she inquired, her strong, sensitive face lighting up. "I'm sorry she's not at home, but you'll come up to the house and rest. Here, Jimmy, you come up this row and meet Dan, and Charlie, you can take the next row when you've finished that one. I know you'll get on famously without me for a while."

Her work dress consisted of a moderately short skirt, freshly laundered blouse and a distinctly feminine hat of dark straw. She chatted merrily as we retraced our steps.

"Where did you get your knowledge of farming?" we asked, our eyes noting the evidences of skill and thoroughness on every hand.

"By inheritance partly," was the prompt rejoinder. "Then we discover many things by experience, such as that if you plant corn once in ten days you get a continuous crop, and we try to mix in enough science to insure good results."

"Are you always as busy as this?" we inquired.

"O, no," was the reply. "Just now we employ four men to do the heaviest work and a dozen boys, who pick peas in the morning and strawberries in the afternoon. But much of the time there are only the flowers to look after, and in the winter we have abundant leisure for reading, music and social life."

Here we reached the house, where we were soon joined by Miss Winsor, a typical gentlewoman of the old school such as is rarely seen nowadays. Entering, we felt as if time had suddenly moved back several generations, for we were surrounded by curios and antiquities, the only noticeable modern articles being a piano, plenty of current literature and a Bodenhausen Madonna. Specimens of art now extinct were here, brought from India and China by a seafaring grandfather, which would command fabulous sums if the owner would consent to part with them; quaint, roomy sideboards of richly veined mahogany; fiddle-back chairs; inlaid Chippendale tables; high-post bedsteads, elaborately carved; to say nothing of the poems in china—Wedgwood, Lowestoft, blue willow—two whole sets of exquisite china made to order, with monogram and crest burnt in. Among other interesting relics were a silver patch box for holding fancifully cut bits of court plaster, such as were carried by old-time belles to supply any pieces disarranged by the heat of the ballroom; paintings on glass done in China, one of them a portrait of Washington; and an excellent copy of Leonardo da Vinci's portrait of himself.

Reluctantly we rose to go. The misty past, peopled with shadows of old-time aristocracy, vanished as we crossed the threshold into the breezy, sunshiny garden, teeming with evidences of present day enterprise and independence. Across the fields we saw the pea-pickers, still bending to their task.

"How do you manage to keep so many restless boys steadily at work?" we asked.

"O, that is simple enough," Miss Mansfield answered easily; "when one gets lazy I just tell him quietly that he can go home now and come back when he feels more like work, and you'd be amazed to see how this treatment tones up all the others."

As I looked at her I thought I should be willing to pay any reasonable sum for the privilege of working beside this fascinating woman, with the dancing eyes, thrilling voice and rare smile.

"But isn't it a kind of slavery during a large part of the year?" we persisted; for we could see that this was no fancywork, but real farming.

"Slavery? No, indeed!" was the indignant rejoinder. "We begin at five o'clock in the morning—the freshest and most delightful part of the day—and we enjoy every moment of it. We get health and magnetism, steadiness of nerve and serenity of temper out of it, to say nothing of the money. Ah, this is real living! We are free—free!"

Free, indeed—to work and think, to live close to nature's heart and drink in all her beauty and healing. To how many suffering women would such a life be heaven itself compared with their present brain-wearied, nerve-tortured existence? Is not here a suggestion for those who have eyes to see the more excellent way, and would not some of New England's abandoned farms, which could be rented, or even purchased, for little more than a song, afford an opportunity for those ready to try the experiment?

TWIN-FLOWER.

(LINNÆA.)

Linnæa, of fairy mold and breath divine,
Dear foster-child of him who gave his name
With dower of love to thee; his fading fame
Thou dost revive at many a wayside shrine,
Where from thy lowly altars incense fine
Floats on the air; so sweet it well might shame
Jasmine or pink, whose odors are but tame,
Matched with that fragrance pure and wild of thine.
Well may the wanderer pause to breathe a prayer
Above that marvel of thy light-poised bells
So sweetly twinned. How clear, to him who heeds,
God's universal thought is written there:
The twofold life that in all nature dwells,
The primal law, that each the other needs!

RETICENCE, NOT DECEIT.

BY HELEN EVERTSON SMITH.

The atoning virtue of confession has been chanted so loudly and so long, especially in works of fiction, that it is refreshing to meet, occasionally, with a story whose author seems aware that there are many cases to prove the righteousness as well as worldly wisdom lying in the old adage, "The least said is the soonest mended." A recent novel, in no wise remarkable for genius, with a clumsy plot and a style having more defects than merits, may be pardoned all its faults for the sake of the useful lesson it conveys. A young woman has married a man much older than herself, while loving, or fancying that she loved, another. As time goes on she learns truly to love her husband, and sincerely repents her former half-hearted allegiance. Not content with this, she now becomes possessed with an overwhelming desire for confessing the matter to her husband, saying to a good old physician who is playing the part of mentor, "I dare not deceive my husband, he is so good and honorable."

The mentor replies: "You have forsaken your fault; now it only remains for you to bury it. Reticence is not deceit. Because your husband is so truly noble I would not have his natural goodness turned to bitterness, his honorable feelings wounded by the knowledge that his wife had, though only in thought, been not wholly his own. I know how in your heart you argue that confession would make it easier for yourself. Put this selfish thought away from you, now and forever. Yours has been the sin and you alone must suffer for it. You have no right to throw upon him the burden of your sin and make him suffer as by knowing it he must."

This mentor, though rather verbose, was possessed of common sense. To maintain silence knowing that another may be blamed for our transgression is, indeed, a cowardly crime. In such cases confession is the first of duties, but in almost all other cases confession is apt to do far more harm than good. Who cannot recall instances in which heartaches and misery would have been saved by ignorance of the repented and forsaken sins of those who were nearest and dearest? This is such a sadly imperfect world that the best to be expected is not that offenses shall not come, but that the offenders shall forsake and silently repent their misdeeds.

Half the time the desire to unbosom one's self by confession is but a morbid state of mind. Poor Marie Bashkirtseff, though perhaps the most widely known of recent self-vivisectionists, is by no means a solitary example of this form of egotism. She was a child of great natural gifts, and in the spirit of the naturalist she dissected herself, in that of the novelist she wrote of herself; always herself was her sole heroine, for she could conceive of no other worthy of her powers. The book, now practically and happily almost forgotten, was widely read only half a decade ago because it was supposed to be a faithful portrait of a human soul. It was but a startling reflection, as in a distorting mirror, of one of the many morbid phases of our multiform human nature. Was any good purpose served by giving it to the world? Has any human being been the happier, the better, the stronger, even the wiser for it? Finally, is there any reason for supposing that needless confessions are ever advisable? We think that there is not and that a wise reticence in regard to past follies or misdeeds is one of the most effective of moral antiseptics.

AFIELD WITH YOUNG NATURALISTS.

GRASSES.

BY MRS. S. J. BUCKLIN.

Rest here, young naturalists, on the brow of this hill and let your eyes wander over the summer landscape. The fields are merry with haymakers and "smell like a mead new-shorn."

> Crowds of bees are giddy with clover,
> Crowds of grasshoppers skip at our feet.

As we listen to the music of bird song mingled with the click of the mower's "rifle" and the swish of the lush grass as it falls beneath the scythe, let us talk of the great Gramineae family, whose domain extends over a large part of the entire globe. To it has been assigned the beneficent task of clothing the earth with verdure and furnishing food, not alone for man, but for myriads of God's creatures. Grasses, grains, rice, corn, sugar cane and bamboo are all members of this family, and not the least important division is the grasses. Possibly forty or fifty varieties may be found in this field, and waving among them we see

> Buttercup faces, beaming and bright;
> Clovers with bonnets, some red and some white;
> Daisies, their white fingers half clasped in prayer, and the yellow St. Johns-wort, whose punctate leaves when held to the light appear to be pierced with tiny holes.

All members of the Gramineae family, save one, are useful, wholesome and nutritious. The poisonous darnel alone bears a bad reputation, and some writers affirm that its poisonous effects may be caused by injuries to the grass and grain by bad weather. However this may be, this "wandering sheep" may easily be spared when the rest of the flock is so valuable. The grasses have hollow, jointed stems, long, narrow, alternate leaves closely clasping the stem, which bears flowers in glumes or bracts arranged in spikelets, racemes or panicles. Bear in mind that a flower consists really of the stamens, pistil and reproductive organs. These, in the grasses, are placed within the glumes or "chaff." Pull off the glume and see how it protects the stamens, numbering one to six, commonly three, and the two styles with their feathery stigmas. Sometimes, in the case of grains, these glumes are "awned," or surmounted with a long bristle, which gives the grain its "bearded" appearance.

Perhaps the most important grass found in New England mowing fields is known as "timothy" or "herd's" grass. The first name is said to have come from one Timothy Hansen, who, it is claimed, cultivated this variety and took the seed from New York to California. Another story states that it was originally cultivated by a man named Herd, who found it growing wild in a swamp in New Hampshire more than a century and a half ago. Whatever the truth of these stories the fact remains that it is a valuable grass and yields large crops of hay on well-cultivated land.

Another familiar grass is the red-top, of which it may be said at this season, "The purpling grasses are no longer young." It has been growing in New England for more than a century and was known in earlier days as English grass or fine bent. This is a beautiful variety especially when in full bloom and will grow in almost any situation. Often growing with these two grasses is another tribe easily distinguished by its tall, graceful stems tipped with a large, loose panicle of spikelets. This is a perennial known as orchard grass and will flourish in shady places, sometimes attaining a hight of over five feet. Its tall, whitish-green stems and also its leaves are densely covered with downy hairs, soft and velvety to the touch. The sweet vernal grass grows in northern locations in meadows, woods and pastures. This is fragrant and is used by Indians in making basket work. Beautiful varieties of grasses are found in meadows and on marsh land near the sea. Among them are the pretty white "cotton" grasses and the tawny "pussy paws" that make such charming bouquets for winter. Very pretty grasses are cultivated in gardens, among them Briza maxima, or quaking grass, and the striped "ribbon" grass. The large feathery plumes of the southern Pampas grass, the stateliest of grasses, are in constant use for ornamentation.

Some interesting facts are relatcd of the beach grass on sandy shores and sea coasts, which has strong roots, running often twenty or thirty feet, preventing the drifting of sand under the action of wind and wave. This wise provision of the Creator was utilized by the United States Government to protect the harbor and village of Provincetown on Cape Cod. The violence of the wind and sea left on the beach, in every driving storm, thousands of tons of sand, and these hills, dried in the sun, were thrown in vast quantities into the harbor and upon the town. Congress appropriated, at different times, over $30,000 to plant beach grass near the town for the protection of the harbor. This measure, united with the natural seeding of the grass and the co-operation of the inhabitants, has removed the terror of sand storms on the western side of the harbor. The sand gathers around the grass and the grass rises above it, and this process continues until many spots are much higher than the original level.

As we look across the grasses we see myriads of fragile webs, which on a dewy morning or damp day are heavy with moisture. There is an old adage that no rain will fall when cobwebs are on the grass. On many of the grass stems you will notice a frothy substance that is deposited by the "spittle insect," which has sometimes been mistaken for a young grasshopper. Myriads of tiny insects live among the grass, and now that the high noon of summer is just upon us the drowzy croon of the crickets makes cheerful music on a dreamy day.

> Let us be glad in this sweet summer weather,
> With the birds and the breezes and flowers,
> With the grass and the earth,
> With the sky and the sun,
> Let us be glad in the summer.

Enjoy your vacation, young friends, with your rods and your nets, and do not forget that a collection of grasses will bring you pleasure and information.

Even education will not give you all that you want. What you want to develop in your race is the art of thinking—and thinking is an art which stands a very good chance of perishing from amongst us altogether. The risks to which independent thinking is exposed, when you come to reckon them up, are manifold and dangerous. I think the press, with all its great merit, is one of the greatest enemies of independent thinking.—Lord Rosebery.

Closet and Altar

Prayers are to the soul what the dew of God is to the flowers. Why should not that gracious dew fall even now and always for all of us upon the fields of life?

Existence comes to feel to many of us like a great river, which is always flowing with unbroken force downward to the sea. It never stops. It is always pushing its waters outward. It gives the sea no chance to flow up into it. So is the ever energetic life of one whose sole idea is to exert influence, to make himself felt in some result. How often the river must long to pause! How often it must become aware that its impetuous rush is losing for it the richness of the great, deep salt sea! How often the busy life of man becomes aware that somewhere round it there is richness which it does not get because it opens outward only, and not inward! How often it desires to pause and grow receptive, and take into itself the richness which it now is keeping out!—Phillips Brooks.

We must know before we can love. In order to know God we must often think of him.—Brother Lawrence.

Calm me, my God, and keep me calm
While these hot breezes blow;
Be like the night dew's cooling balm
Upon earth's fevered brow.

Yes, keep me calm, though loud and rude
The sounds my ear that greet;
Calm in the closet's solitude,
Calm in the bustling street;

Calm as the ray of sun or star,
Which storms assail in vain;
Moving unruffled through earth's war
The eternal calm to gain.

—H. Bonar.

It is not the will of Christ that we should depend merely on the hope of the future. It is not his will that any part of life should be a blank space, an uncomforted stretch of desert through which we march to the Promised Land. The remedy for care is to realize the love of God in Christ, moment by moment, touching all existence and glorifying it—if we will—with peace and joy. —W. R. Nicoll.

We ask thy help, our Heavenly Father, that we may gain release from our own ignorance, and that under the inspiration of thy Spirit we may rise to some such thought of thee as shall fill our hearts with gladness and inspire us with hope and with love. In spite of what we see, in spite of what we hear, in spite of all that is evil and all the causes that are working to destroy, and all that maketh pain and suffering, we rejoice that we may believe in a Redeemer. We rejoice that our faith is so much more comforting than our sight. We ask to be delivered from the thrall of our senses and from those lower reasonings that belong to these mortal bodies. We ask for that power of faith by which we shall be able to realize the invisible and ineffable, for that rest, that confidence, that hope which endures through the night. We pray for God in us, for the divine consolation, for thy forgiveness, for that food which thou art to every hungry soul, for that water of life by which thou dost quench evil desire and satisfy holy longing. Amen.

Mothers in Council.

SHOULD CHILDREN BE TAUGHT THAT THEY ARE SINNERS?

Years ago most Christian parents would have answered this question in the affirmative without hesitation. Today there is an honest difference of opinion as to the wisdom of recognizing the fact of individual sin in the heart of a little child. Much depends, of course, upon the manner in which the idea is presented to the tender minds of those who are still infants. The method used by one mother is well illustrated in the sketch which follows, and we shall be glad to print comments and experiences from others who believe that the subject is one of momentous import.

Avie was a winsome, sunny-tempered little maid of four. Hers was a Christian home where the Bible was reverenced, and at the age of three years she joined the infant class in Sunday school, under a wise teacher who believed that there is nothing like God's words to make the little ones wise unto salvation. To each child she gave a slip of paper containing a verse from the Bible to be committed to memory and recited the next Sunday. Simple texts like "The Lord is my Shepherd," or "Suffer little children," or "God is love" naturally came first, but after some months the teacher thought it time that her pupils began to look into their own hearts a little. Avie's next verse, therefore, was: "God be merciful to me a sinner."

At home she asked her usual volley of questions, "What does merciful mean?" "How can God be merciful to sinners?" then, catching sight of the pronoun, she exclaimed, "Who does it mean?"

"Whom does it say?" asked her mother.

"It says me and I'm not a sinner," she replied, indignantly, much to her mother's surprise.

"What is a sinner?" asked her mother.

"Folks that do wicked things," Avie answered.

"Don't you do wrong sometimes, Avie, and isn't it always wicked to do wrong?" questioned the mother, gently.

"I don't swear and steal and kill folks," the little girl answered, vehemently, for her usually gentle spirit was greatly disturbed by this first conflict with our schoolmaster, the law.

"No, dear," was the reply, "you wouldn't know what to say if you wanted to swear, and your wants are supplied so you are not tempted to steal and you are not large enough or strong enough to kill anybody if you hated them ever so much, but you pull out mother's knitting needles when you have been told not to and do other naughty things, and God has said, 'Whosoever offends in one point is guilty of all.'"

"Well," said Avie, with a lofty toss of her head, "I don't think that is fair."

The mother lifted her heart to God for wisdom to answer the dear little Pharisee at her knee. Among Avie's cherished possessions was a small glass goblet and the mother chose this as a simple illustration of what she wished to teach the child.

"See here, dear," she said, "suppose brother should take your goblet out to the faucet to drink from and should break a piece out of the bottom. You come to me and say, 'He has broken my goblet.' 'No,' he says, 'she ought not to say I have broken the goblet, I have only broken a little bit from the bottom. It will stand quite as well and it will hold just as much water and the edge is as smooth to drink from as ever.' But you would reply. 'The bottom is a part of the whole and he has broken my goblet.' Your goblet is made of different parts. There is the bottom, the standard, the stem, the bowl and the edge, and all the parts make one goblet, so God's law is made up of different commandments. There are commands about swearing, stealing, killing and also about disobeying parents and other wrong things. All these commands make one law and whoever breaks one of these commandments breaks God's law. Sinners are those who break the law of God."

Avie made no reply. She could not dispute her mother's argument, but she did not want to think she was a sinner. She had never thought much about it but supposed she was quite a good little girl. She often saw others who acted much worse. But her awakened conscience, unsullied by sophistry, would not let her believe she had never done wrong. She stood in thoughtful silence and then quietly went and looked at her little goblet. No, it was not broken. It stood there fair and whole. But, O! that dreadful law of God; it must have been broken when she pulled out those knitting needles. She remembered thinking she ought not to pull them out, but she did so love to see the stitches drop off one by one. Very quiet was the little one the rest of the day, and the children privately asked mother if she thought Avie felt quite well. When Avie's mother was ready to prepare her for bed the little one came to her side and said in a quiet, controlled voice, "I can say my verse, mother. 'God be merciful to me, a sinner,'" and broke into a fit of low, grieved sobbing. Quickly she was gathered into loving arms and told of the forgiving love of the dear Saviour who died for us "while we were yet sinners." Before the sweet blue eyes closed in sleep the sense of forgiven sin transformed the hitherto sorrowful little face and filled it with peace.

Not until Avie was eleven years old did she recognize the fact that she had yielded her heart to the Saviour and asked that she might join his people around the communion table, but those in her home saw from that time onward daily evidences of her discipleship and growth in grace. She is now a woman, and the little ones of the Junior C. E. Society gather around her while she tells them of the Saviour and his tender love for the repenting sinner. S. H. S.

AMUSING CHILDREN.

A lady starting on a long journey with two children placed in her satchel some pieces of cardboard, scissors and lead pencils. After the novelty of car riding had worn off this wise woman produced her treasures. One child cut the cardboard into pieces three-quarters of an inch square, the other printed on each square a letter. The alphabet was repeated many times. Then each formed words from the letters and gave to the other to make out. In this way they amused themselves for hours.

The mother might have taken the game from home with less trouble to herself, but well she knew there would be more satisfaction in making it for themselves. Paper dolls were cut and extensive wardrobes fashioned from bright-colored paper that had been thoughtfully provided. At the end of the journey the passengers declared the children wonderfully well-behaved, and wished they might always travel with such happy little people. The fact was the children were ordinary children, but their hours had been so pleasantly occupied there had been no opportunity for becoming weary and then disagreeable.—Good Housekeeping.

WANTED—NAMES OF BOOKS FOR MOTHERS.

I am on a committee to select books for a Mothers' Reading Club. Each lady buys one book and they are passed each month at the temperance meetings. The club numbers twelve so that we plan for a year. It has worked nicely during the last year. May I ask for a suggestion as to suitable books for the purpose? Our home is in a small village and most of us are busy mothers, but we want to keep up with the times a little and in sympathy with our children. Some of the books we had last year are: What Shall We Do With Our Daughters, by Mrs. Livermore; Bits of Talk on Home Subjects, by H. H.; Plain Talks with Young Home-Makers, by Mrs. Harris; A Study of Child Nature, by Elizabeth Harrison; Man Wonderful in the House Beautiful and Girls and Women by E. Chester. A. C. P.

I would choose Sir Walter Scott of all men to live with and place second to him the Autocrat of the Breakfast Table.—R. F. Horton.

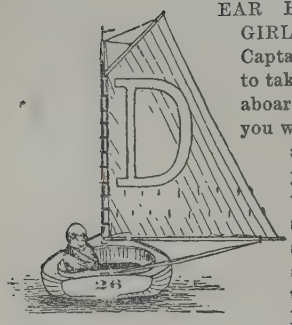
The Conversation Corner.



EAR BOYS AND GIRLS: The "old Captain" is ready to take any of you aboard and carry you wherever you are to spend your vacation, long or short, by seaside or riverside, no matter where, so he has a very little water for his web-feet! This letter tells where one new member is going.

SOUTH WEYMOUTH, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: I am ten years old and have four brothers. One of my brothers colored a picture of a man and we made a rhyme about it:

> There was a man, a beauty rare,
> With yellow eyes and crimson hair.
> His flaring eyes of azure blue
> Looked down on a suit of violet hue.

I have been reading Miss Jewett's Deephaven, and mamma and I are going down to York the first two weeks in August. I should like very much to be a Cornerer. May I?

P. S. I wish you would give your full name and address in the Corner. HELEN R.

I envy you your outing at "Old York," with grand old "Agameticus" in the background and the great ocean before you. If you stop on the beach you must go up to the village and see the "old jail," and other ancient landmarks. You will find some old epitaphs in the burying ground. You remember that Capt. John Smith was here several years before our 256 ancestors—see last week's Corner Scrap-Book—landed at Plymouth. I have just heard of two boys who are going to Newcastle, not far from York, and two girls who are going to ancient Pemaquid, farther down the Maine coast. They will all find plenty of history, if they keep their eyes and ears open.

That is poetry—it has rhythm, imagination, color. I do not, to be sure, quite understand about those bi-colored eyes, but true poetry is not usually understood. A speaker at a ladies' seminary a few days ago said that when a woman once asked the poet Browning the meaning of some verses of his, his reply was that he did not know—she must ask the "Browning Society"!

As to your P. S., you must have my correct address already, for your letter came properly. If you really wish my full name, I have no objections to giving it, especially as I have had several similar requests since the third column of our page was started. I rejoice in it as a heroic, historic, missionary name, right through. Read it in an "endless chain," and you will see: Henry Martin, Martin Luther, Henry Martin, etc. I ought to say, however, that I was never called Luther in my boyhood, but now I like it quite as well as Henry. Perhaps you meant my vacation address. It will be at different places for two weeks. If I see anything worth telling I will tell it.

I did see something worth telling the other day, and will tell it briefly. Willie, the office boy—who, although he is not nearly as old as the man in the moon, resembles him in this, that he always has a smiling face, and they say that he is always faithful as well as cheerful—said he was going to the Children's Festival at Mechanics Hall. (It was Saturday afternoon.) I started as early as he did, but I stopped at the Public Library to see if I could find any of those poetical quotations our members are always asking about. Besides that unfruitful search I went, as I always like to do, into the Children's Room.

I saw there perhaps a dozen children who had not gone to the festival. They were comfortably sitting at tables, reading books from the low shelves which were all around the room. One was reading a Henty, another one of Jules Verne's books, and so on. They can take them down from the shelves themselves, and put them back. If they want to carry them home they can do so. They can get a catalogue of all the children's books at the counter for one cent. The lady in charge, who sits at a table near the door, kindly called my attention to numerous sets of autographs which are framed in something like little doors, opening out of the wall of the room. They all had to do with the history of Massachusetts, as the men who took part in the Boston Tea-party, the Committee of Safety, Naval Commanders, Some of the Loyalists, etc. What a blessing it is for children to have access to good libraries, especially to one so full of art and beauty, as well as learning, as the "Boston Public"!

Mechanics Hall, when I got there, was full and overflowing, but somehow I got into the jam in the balcony, and when the unoccupied reserved seats were suddenly thrown open I had the chance to jump over into one of them—and such a splendid sight! Three thousand boys and girls, graduates of the grammar schools of Boston, were seated on the floor, and the balconies were filled with the parents and other children. How the young graduates cheered as the governor and the mayor came upon the platform, and afterwards when they addressed them. The band played Old Hundred and America, and all the children marched two by two across the platform, the mayor of the city giving to each one a bouquet from the banks of flowers which were there. The children came in schools —with the name of their school on a banner which two little girls or boys held up until their school had passed—Bowditch, Warren, Prescott, Mather, Winthrop, etc. As they all marched around the hall to their seats, they were given each a package —I suppose of peanuts—and afterwards were served with cake and ice cream. I had the privilege of holding up, so that she could see, a little girl from South Boston, who evidently arrived later than I and who enjoyed it almost as much as I did!

SOUTH WEYMOUTH, MASS.

My dear Mr. Martin: I am very much interested in the Conversation Corner, and in Pomiuk too. I am eight years old. We haven't any cats or dogs. We had a nice dog once, a great bird dog. We have lots of flowers. I cannot think of anything more to write, so good-by. THEODORE R.

Theodore has one qualification for an acceptable preacher! I suppose, too, he is one of the poets of the first letter above and that Helen R. is his sister, although from another letter I happen to know that Theodore has only three brothers, and she says she has four. Can you reconcile that?

Mr. Martin

CORNER SCRAP-BOOK.

He Chased a Rabbit and Caught a Book. It was Prof. Joseph Henry, for many years the head of the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, and a very eminent man in scientific knowledge and discovery. A lady handed me last night a cutting, several years old, about the way he got his start in helpful reading. While chasing a rabbit in his boyhood he crawled through the wall of the country meeting house. Seeing a ray of light coming through a broken floor he followed that and found himself in a room containing books belonging to the town library. He began to read one and became so much interested that he went again and again to the room, in the underground way, until he was allowed admission by the door. This was his first appetite for reading.

He Got Sick and Read Another. A few years after, while kept in the house by illness, he took up a book accidentally left on the table by a boarder. It was a volume of lectures on experimental philosophy. He read these questions: "Why does flame or smoke always mount upwards, though no force is used to send them in that direction? You look into a well and see your face painted there. Why is this? You are told it is done by the reflection of light. But what is the reflection of light?" After his death (in 1878) this book of "Gregory's Lectures" was found in his library, with this entry on the fly leaf: "This book, although by no means a profound work, has under Providence exerted a remarkable influence upon my life. . . . It opened to me a new world of thought and enjoyment, invested things before almost unnoticed with the highest interest, fixed my mind on the study of nature and caused me to resolve at the time of reading it that I would immediately commence to devote my life to the acquisition of knowledge." Boys: take a hint from Joseph Henry. Don't wait till you are chasing a rabbit into a dark cellar, or till you are convalescing from sickness, but pick up a book and read something that will set you to thinking—then keep on reading and thinking!

Boys in Their Teens. Dr. Stables of the R. N. (we do not have that abbreviation in America, but you know what it means) has an interesting talk to readers of the Boy's Own Paper, an extract from which will do just as well for boys this side the ocean. He has in mind boys who suffer from nervousness as the result of their own thoughtless conduct. He says this may all be cured by themselves if they have the moral courage to avoid bad habits and carry out a few simple instructions. As to food, eat but little meat, as this is exciting. Live for a time on plenty of milk, eggs, fish, pudding and porridge, if you can get them. Take a large draught of hot, or even cold, water half an hour before breakfast. You should have eight hours' sleep, or even nine. Sleep on a hard mattress and with as few bedclothes as possible. Cultivate the habit of lying on your right side, not on your back. Take a cold sponge bath every morning. Rub very well down with rough towel. Look upon cold water and fresh air as your dearest friends and real physicians.

What the Children Say. One little Corner child was playing Sunday school with her dolls one day, and began to talk very loud. She was asked not to talk "quite so loud." "O, I am playing I am sup'rintendent now. He is the man that stays out in the big room and hollers, you know."

The same little girl was asked to repeat the "golden text" one Sunday and promptly answered: "It is awful to do good on the Sabbath day." Sometimes it seems almost as though some older people had learned the text in that same way!

LESSON FOR AUG. 2. 2 Sam. 9: 1-13.

DAVID'S KINDNESS.

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D.D.

A fine exhibition of David's character is given in this incident. Honor, affection between friends undimmed by years, generous devotion to the unfortunate are Christian virtues, and David in the event here recorded nobly illustrated them. We may apprehend these virtues by studying:

1. The story of David's kindness. Many years before two young men were in a field by a school near where the prophet Samuel lived. One was the king's son, Jonathan. The other was David, an attendant at court by the king's request. But Saul had become jealous of him, and he knew that the time had come when his only safety was in flight. Jonathan dreaded to have him go, for he loved David as he loved his own soul. So they made a solemn covenant that they would be faithful, not only to each other, but to each other's children. Jonathan was convinced that his own family fortunes would decline and that David would come to the throne. He therefore made David promise, "Thou shalt not only while yet I live, show me the kindness of the Lord, . . . but also thou shalt not cut off thy kindness from my house forever." Again and yet again David repeated the vow, and then they parted with kisses and many tears. That was the beginning of David's kindness, and the story of it is completed in this and following chapters.

If David had not kept his vow to Jonathan his failure would have been greatly to his discredit. But how many are there at fifty years of age to whom the promises of twenty-five years before are still fresh and binding? We hear sometimes of men who keep with each other the covenants of boyhood, and who do kindnesses to children for their fathers' sakes, and the knowledge of such deeds increases our confidence in human nature and our gratitude to God. The world is made better by our loyalty to our earlier ideals.

2. The object of David's kindness. When Jonathan died with his father on Mount Gilboa, he left a little son five years old, probably at Gibeah. When the tidings of the disaster were brought from Jezreel, the people were thrown into consternation. The nurse of the boy caught him in her arms and fled, but in her fright she stumbled and the child fell from her shoulder and was so injured that both his feet became permanently lame. He was then carried across the Jordan and found a home with a Hebrew nobleman. There in obscurity, almost in secrecy, he grew up to manhood and married. David had never heard of him, but Ziba, an old servant of Saul, knew of him. He appears to have been without ambition, with no disposition to claim his royal inheritance, and entirely without attractions which would of themselves lead distinguished men to seek his companionship.

3. The reasons for David's kindness. He sought to fulfill the pledge he had made in his youth to Jonathan. While his kingdom was as yet insecure, and many of the people were still inclined to continue their allegiance to Saul's family, it was not safe for David to bring into prominence a member of that family with claims to the throne. But all the tribes were now united in David, and without danger to that union he could honor the son of his old friend.

David also sought to show respect for the royal house which he had superseded by the will of God. His relations with that house had been close and tender, in spite of the injustice he had received from Saul. He never ceased to love it. One of the most pathetic songs ever written was David's elegy over the death of Saul and Jonathan. That house had done much to raise him to honor and power. In it he had found his first wife and the dearest friend he had ever known. Mephibosheth was his nephew by marriage, and the constant presence of the young man at the royal table was a public recognition of relations which in every family ought to be held sacred.

4. The effect of David's kindness. His own heart was enlarged by it. Whoever does a generous deed becomes nobler by doing it. This act of David is an illustration of Christ's saying that whosoever should give to a child a cup of cold water in his name, that is, with his spirit, should not lose his reward. The kindness David showed he called the kindness of God. It was a service for which no return could be made. But it brought its own return in enriching the manhood of the giver. This is the lesson which our Lord taught with emphasis and supremely illustrated in his own life.

David's kindness to his nephew also strengthened the family ties of the whole nation. Whatever divisions arise in households, each person has peculiar obligations to care for needy members of his own family. Good men and women cannot forget their own kindred. In this respect some heathen nations set examples which we may wisely heed. Not money only, but the kindness of affection, the recognition of family ties, is due to those of our own blood. A royal present to Mephibosheth at Lo-debar would have been only a trifle compared with the invitation to be a member of the king's family and to sit at his table.

David's kindness must have strengthened his position as king and aided the growing unity of the nation. It was a great task to which he was called—to make of the twelve tribes one people, to develop a common patriotism, and to face as one nation the hostile tribes around them. But with Mephibosheth an honored member of the king's family, the followers of Saul and David could clasp hands. The great deeds of both became the pride of all. They shared a common inheritance and sought a common destiny.

Thus devotion to God, manly purposes and self-interest combined to prompt David's kindness to the son of his old friend. The same motives must inspire every Christian to serve first those whom he is pledged to love because of dear ties formed in early life, and those who have on him claims of kindred, and those who need kindness from him which, when given, makes society more humane and the nation stronger. Good deeds done without hope of reward to those who need us bring us into closest fellowship with good men and nearest to God.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR NOTES.

As a result of a meeting held in the Wyandotte County jail during the Kansas convention, a society has been started among the prisoners, beginning with a membership of eight.——A prayer meeting held by twelve delegates in the little town where they spent Sunday, on their way to the Washington State convention, created so much interest that a society is to be formed there.

A Cherokee Indian traveled 800 miles to attend the Colorado convention as a delegate of a society two months old. At the convention there was reported a large increase in societies during the year. The banner offered for the society showing the largest proportionate increase was won by the African Methodist Episcopal Society of Colorado Springs, which grew in membership in eight months from 20 to 165. One society reported 50 conversions through its influence.

"Your Presence Solicited: Come Everybody," was the form of invitation that was sent out for the Texas convention, and more than 1,500 responded. For the first time at a convention in that State there was a rally for the Juniors, who sung a song especially written for them by the author of the State song. A rousing meeting for good citizenship was held in the Alamo, and was addressed by Dr. Clark. During the closing consecration meeting there was a heavy storm, and the wind and rain made it difficult to hear some of the responses, but gave the more meaning to the song, "A shelter in the time of storm," and others. The correspondence committee has made especial efforts, the State committee being made up of one representative from each town or city.

Congregationalism Among Scandinavians. Prof. R. A. Jernberg, who has charge of the Danish-Norwegian department of Chicago Theological Seminary, is in this vicinity visiting the Norwegian churches in New Haven and Hartford, Ct., Concord, Lowell, Boston and other places in Massachusetts. During the twelve years since this foreign department was opened in Chicago, eighty young men have received instruction in preparation for the ministry and twenty-seven have graduated. A large part of these men are now pastors in our Norwegian home missionary churches and the value of our educational work for Scandinavians is seen when we compare their intellectual qualifications with the Free Church preachers in Norway and Denmark who have no training for their work. There are now 2,000,000 Scandinavians in this country, only one-fourth of whom can be counted as members of any church. We have at present about thirty Danish and Norwegian Congregational churches and missions in various stages of development, and they are united in an Eastern and a Western Association. One of the strongest is the First Scandinavian Church in Chicago, and Minneapolis, Clintonville, Wis., Britt and Wesley, Io., and Danway, Ill., are centers of an important work in large settlements of Norwegians. A valuable aid in close connection with this foreign department of the seminary is the Norwegian religious newspaper, Evangelisten.

A Constantinople Commencement. Commencement week is a notable occasion, not only for the American College for Girls but for the whole city of Constantinople. The exercises in this Turkish institution were much like those at Wellesley or Bryn Mawr at this season. Indeed, Dr. Basil L. Gildersleeve of Johns Hopkins University, who delivered the Commencement address, spoke on the same theme which last year formed the subject of his address at Bryn Mawr Commencement—a delicate tribute to the scholarship and intellectual caliber of the Constantinople young women. Another much appreciated feature of the season was Miss Clara Barton's inspiring address to the almunæ. The high standing of the American college in the community is evidenced by the presence at the Commencement exercises of such dignitaries as the minister of public instruction in the realm of Abdul Hamid, the ecumenical patriarch of the Greek Church, the patriarch of the Armenian Church, a representative of the United States Government in the person of Mr. Riddle, the civil head of the evangelical community and the president and secretary of the Greek Syllogos. Five young women received diplomas. The past year has been characterized by its usual faithful and enthusiastic work highly creditable to the able president, Miss Mary M. Patrick, and the college has taken a decided step in advance, which will make it able to stand comparison with other American colleges, in arranging its curriculum in elective courses, literary, classical and scientific.

Praise from an Unexpected Quarter. German colonial governors have not always been interested in and appreciative of our missionary work in Micronesia, so we value the more the favorable report of Dr. Irmer, governor in the Marshall group, after a tour among the islands which extended as far as Ponape and Kusaie. At the latter place he was specially impressed with the beauty of the mission site, which he describes at length, and with the domestic and industrial arrangements in the mission buildings. In regard to the schools he testifies that "the instruction is given in an earnest, intelligent way, and especially the white school mistresses, by their reserved yet friendly attitude toward the girls, made the most favorable impression. The tidiness of the pupils in their clothing, their fresh appearance and evident cheerfulness, show that the solicitude even for their bodily welfare is intense." And the German official adds, with apparent enthusiasm: "I understand now how it is that our Kanakas, even after years, look back to this place of their youthful training as a paradise, and that they pay the debt of gratitude by great loyalty to the mission."

THE WORLD AROUND.

China's White Fields. The same report of white harvest fields but pitiful scarcity of laborers which comes from the Foochow Mission of the A. B. C. F. M. is sent by Dr. Griffith John, the well-known missionary of the L. M. S. At the station of Hian Kan, about forty miles from Hankow, the accommodations are already too small for the number of regular worshipers, and it is necessary to purchase additional property to meet the growing need, while at Yun Mung, eight miles distant, where not long ago the small vestry amply sufficed to accommodate the little company of believers, the chapel itself must be rebuilt on a larger scale. In the counties of Tien Men and King Shan, through which Dr. John has been making an evangelistic tour, a remarkable work of grace is going on. The missionaries were received with open arms, and the converts in two towns gave houses suitable for mission premises. On this tour 121 persons were baptized, and Dr. John appeals to the L. M. S. for more workers: "If the work continues to grow, as it now promises to do, we shall have thousands of converts in these two districts in the near future. There have been more than 250 baptisms in King Shan alone since October, 1894, and there are hundreds there now waiting to be baptized."

Even more interesting than this movement is an incident which indicates the reasonable prospect of an advance into Hunan, the central province that has been notorious for its hostility toward foreigners and toward Christianity. It appears that about seven years ago Dr. John baptized a man living in Hunan, named Li Yen-keng, who has been carrying on Christian work among his own people, having a free night school where Christian books were used. As a result four whole families are ready for baptism. Now Mr. Li has come forward and given his house and a large piece of land to the English society. This is the first property owned by a Protestant mission in the Province of Hunan.

Italian Christians. The twenty-fifth report of the Evangelical Church of Italy records encouraging advance in the past year, which has added five to its list of congregations, besides many smaller groups of believers. With 132 additional places, regularly visited by evangelists, the field of operations has been enlarged to 208 boroughs, an increase of fifteen during the twelve months. In many congregations there has been a quickening of spiritual life and 349 members have been added to the churches. Sunday schools number twenty-seven and day schools six. It is estimated that evangelistic work is carried forward among a mass of population equal to about 15,000 persons, including church members, catechumens, school children and adherents. One of the most interesting incidents of the report concerns the stand taken by a parish priest in Florence. After ten years of conscientious struggles in regard to leaving the Roman Church he has at last broken away from it and is now studying for the evangelical ministry. In his letter of abjuration he said: "For the love I bear to Christ, the only fountain of human salvation, I hereby promise, in full faith and holy enthusiasm, to give myself to the preaching of the gospel and to spare no efforts to call sinners from error to the truth."

PRAYER MEETING.

BY REV. H. A. BRIDGMAN.

Topic, Aug. 2–8. Little Kindnesses. Luke 7: 36–47.

We need to practice little kindnesses, first of all because genuine Christianity does away with false distinctions between great and little. Jesus said once that the finest representative of the old Jewish religion was inferior to the humblest member of the kingdom which he was proclaiming. He did not mean to depreciate John the Baptist but he wanted the world, and his disciples in particular, to get a clear idea of the new type of man that the gospel exalts. So, passing from men to things, Jesus undoubtedly held that what the world counts noble achievements are small in comparison with the least services done in the name of Christ and prompted by loyalty to him.

We come into the Christian life ambitious, perhaps, to accomplish much in it. As we read what saints and heroes of other days have done, as we see what men like Professor Drummond, D. L. Moody and Dr. F. E. Clark are doing today, we dare to hope that God may use us in some such conspicuous way. But the truth is that ninety-nine out of the hundred of us must be content to be privates and not generals. Our Christianity must operate in a narrow sphere and must concern itself with humdrum everyday matters. We realize what the Christian life in its essence is only when we get Jesus' point of view and see how these little acts of kindness take on size and grandeur. If life as a whole be great, then all its parts are correspondingly great.

Small kindnesses are indexes of character. You instinctively form a favorable opinion of the stranger on the car who politely gives up the end seat to the new comer. He who is capable of little unnoticed sacrifices like that, you think, is likely to be more agreeable and trustworthy in all the relations of life. There is a pleasure, too, in exercising the kindly spirit, because so often the recipient shows a gratitude out of all proportion to the importance of the kindness extended. It seems such a trifling thing to give a ragged city child a flower, but the happy, grateful look which the favor produces shows that you have brought a large pleasure into the little heart, and for the moment brought to it a big share of God's beautiful world.

Little kindnesses become perfunctory and valueless unless they are expressions of one's love to Christ. It was because the heart of the woman portrayed in our passage was overflowing with devotion to the Saviour that her tears fell like rain. "St. John did not imitate Jesus," says Ian Maclaren, "he assimilated him." A passionate love for Jesus is, after all, the only exhaustless fountain of generous impulses and friendly acts. We shall not grow weary of well-doing when everything we do is done unto him.

THE CHURCH PRAYER MEETING.

Topic, July 26–Aug. 1. Spiritual Independence and Its Limits. 1 Cor. 10: 23–33.

How far must I follow the conscience of others? To what extent ought I to be guided by Christian teachers? How far may I assert my own conscience as supreme?

BOOK REVIEWS.

BIOGRAPHY.

Professor Sloane is uncommonly modest n the introduction to his Life of James McCosh, in which he speaks of a time when a different and larger biography will be called for. To us the book seems adequate and we doubt whether a more sympathetic and ntelligent biographer could easily be found, or a time arrive when the world would be mpatient for much more detail of a prominent and useful life than is here given. The tendency of the age is to biographies, with a crowding of detail which greatly limits the number of their readers.

Dr. McCosh was singularly happy in a long and successful life, a fine personal presence and well used opportunities of educational and church leadership in Scotland, Ireland and America, and, happiest of all, in that the time of his activity coincided with important beginnings in the three lands of his residence of great intellectual and social movements with which he identified himself and two of which he saw carried to a triumphant success. In Scotland he was one of the leaders in the Disruption and the organization of the Free Church, and was especially influential in the raising of the sustentation fund, by whose aid that movement was placed upon a permanent basis. In Ireland he had his share both in the development of the new government scheme for higher education and in that agitation for disestablishment which culminated in the separation of the church from the state, and in America he became prominent in that widening of liberty in university education in which Princeton, under his guidance, had so large a share. In addition to this, which constitutes his chief claim upon the interest of the public, he was a voluminous and influential writer upon metaphysical and psychological subjects, and did much to awaken and direct interest and to raise up students in those departments by his example and enthusiasm.

He came to Princeton when the fortunes of the institution were at a low ebb. It was his task at once to enlist the enthusiasm of the public and to raise the morale of the students. He overcame the prejudice which undoubtedly existed against him as a foreigner and raised large sums of money for buildings and endowments. He was too absent-minded and uneven and too quick-tempered to make an ideal administrator of discipline for young men, and on this side his work was not at first so successful, as he himself seemed to feel when he wrote: "For sixteen years I had the somewhat invidious task of looking after the morals and discipline of the college. Since that time this important work has been committed to Dean Murray, who has shown more patience than I did in the discharge of his duties." It would have been wiser if the new president's work had not been hampered by this task, but as soon as the new scholarly enthusiasm began to make itself felt the atmosphere of the institution changed rapidly for the better, and he was free to devote himself to his proper task, which in itself was difficult enough.

The autobiographical element of the book is particularly charming in its pictures of boyhood in Scotland, in which Dr. McCosh shows that he appreciated the picturesque elements of the life out of which he came with a true insight and humor, which formed a racy element of his more informal public and private talks. It may also be set down as part payment of the debt which we owe him that he learned his first theology from the work of President Dwight.

We are glad to see the cordial tribute of the book to the influence of Mrs. McCosh, who was her husband's helper in more ways than perhaps he himself appreciated, and whose memory is cherished with loving reverence by many a former student with whom the president's absent-minded, and often clumsy, attempts at cordiality counted for nothing at all. The biography as a whole is well and interestingly written, and Mr. J. H. Dulles has appended a complete bibliography of the voluminous writings of Dr. McCosh. [Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50]

STUDIES IN CRITICISM.

There is a marked difference between most of the books of critical essays published a generation ago and the books of that kind which lie before us. In the beginning of the century and in the great British reviews the critic was a man who, if he did not assume the attitude of omniscience, at least took up the subject of the book he handled and treated it as one who understood it as fully as the author himself.

Macaulay's essays, for instance, and Carlyle's are books of massive discussion and original contribution to the matters of which they treat, and the tone in which the author's work is handled is that of equality or superiority. The books of that age to which these modern critical essays are most nearly akin are the books of purely literary essays published by Hazlitt, Leigh Hunt and others, the contents of which were originally newspaper rather than review contributions, and dwelt with pure literature rather than with history, biography or science. The brightest and most original of these recent books is Adventures in Criticism, by Quiller Couch, all the essays of which were originally printed in the great English Liberal weekly The Speaker. Mr. Couch is a Cornish man and adds to a keen literary sense and power not a little of the Celtic humor. He has his own clear ideas of the literary quality of the authors whom he treats, and while we may not always find ourselves in agreement with him we are ready to acknowledge that he gives strong reasons for the opinion which he holds. A fine illustration of his judgment and discriminative power will be found in the essay on M. Zola, and the quality of his thought in regard to pure literature in a delightful essay on the Popular Conception of a Poet. It is not often that a book of transient literary criticism is so well worth reprinting for its own fine style and permanent suggestiveness as the book under review. [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.]

Mr. Richard Le Gallienne, in Retrospective Reviews, has as light a touch as Mr. Couch, but it hardly seems to us so sure. His two volumes admirably answer their purpose as "a sort of literary diary of the time," or, in the nautical phrase of the title page, a "literary log," but the essential difficulty with Mr. Le Gallienne is that he is so delighted to praise that he often quite forgets the judicial faculty of the critic. Not every goose is a swan, but every goose whom he admits to his regard occasionally, at least in his opinion, lays a golden egg. He has an especially keen eye for lyric verse, and his range and delight in poetry runs from the simplest utterance of unlettered singers to the labyrinthine mysteries of Meredith. We should like the book better if he had omitted the initial chapter on Some First and Second Principles of Criticism, in which there is a trace of self-consciousness and doubt of self in regard to the often expressed hostile opinion of critics which seems to us to weaken the author's power. But the book is rich throughout in kindly and suggestive judgments. [Dodd, Mead & Co. 2 vols. $1.75 each.]

In Critical Kit Kats Edmund Gosse gives us a much larger element of original research and addition to knowledge than either of the books just mentioned. The story of the Sonnets from the Portuguese, confided to him by Robert Browning, for example, has been widely quoted and is of great interest. This element of original knowledge and accumulation adds weight and interest to the volume, making it indispensable to the literary history of the time. Mr. Gosse's style is neither so light nor so sure as that of Mr. Couch or Mr. Le Gallienne and the element of humor is almost entirely lacking, but the importance and interest of the personalities described and characterized holds the interest of the reader from the first. [Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.25.]

ARCHÆOLOGY.

The Mound-Builders, Their Works and Relics, by Rev. Stephen D. Peet. Archæological researches in America are gradually accumulating material for the study of prehistoric man. In our own territory there are three races or types at least, the Mound-Builders, the Cliff-Dwellers and the Indians, and of these the first have been the greatest puzzle to the archæologists. Mr. Peet rejects the theory which would identify them with the Indians without accepting the opposing ascription to them of a high degree of civilization. That man in America was coeval with the mastodon he is convinced, and, indeed, the relics which have been discovered leave us little room for doubt upon this point. The book shows a wide range of study and research, and is of great value and interest to historians and anthropologists. The illustrations are effective and there is a good index. Other volumes upon Myths and Symbols and Cliff-Dwellings and Ruined Cities are to follow. [Chicago: Office of the American Antiquarian. $3.50.]

Another book upon the same topic is Prehistoric Americans, by the Marquis de Nadaillac. It is in two parts, the Mound-Builders and the Cliff-Dwellers, and reaches practically the same conclusions as the book of Mr. Peet on the same subject. It has the advantages and disadvantages of being a summary of the topic rather than a book of original research. It is brief enough to be easy reading and avoids the repetition necessary in citing particulars and details of discovery, but it lacks the illustrations and first-hand descriptions of Mr. Peet's work. It is a useful compend, however, of the results of study and opinions of specialists, and brings out well the importance and the width of the field of knowledge involved. The style is clear and well rendered into good English, but there is neither index nor table of contents. [Chicago: D. H. McBride & Co. 50 cents.]

an interesting theme, which was originally prepared as a thesis for degree in the University of Colorado. It is a full and interesting account of the methods and principles of Roman education, and is particularly suggestive in its description of the home care and training in the better times of the Roman state. Parents and teachers will find it interesting and suggestive. [Macmillan & Co. 75 cents.]

HISTORICAL STORIES.

The Reds of the Midi, translated from the Provençal of Felix Gras by Catherine A. Janvier, is a delightful book. In it the story of the famous Marseillaise Battalion is told by a peasant with thrilling simplicity. The cruel oppression of the poor and the utter servility into which many of them sank are so graphically portrayed that no one can wonder at the revolt of the stronger natures among them and their struggle for independence which revolutionized France. The introduction by Thomas A. Janvier is a charming tribute to the work and genius of a dear personal friend. [D. Appleton & Co. $1.50.]

The Cavaliers, a novel by S. R. Keightley. This is a first-rate historical novel, full of life and action and of vivid characterization, which carries us through the history of the contest between the Parliament and the king in England just before the Commonwealth. The pictures of the two great actors of the time, Cromwell and King Charles, are especially striking, and the book is all the more a valuable historical picture because the movement of the story is never subordinated to the undue elaboration of its historical features. [Harper & Bros. $1.50.]

For King or Country, by James Barnes, is a well-told story of the American Revolution. It is an account of the adventures of twin brothers who look so much alike that even their relatives are often unable to distinguish them, and frequent mistakes are made in consequence. One is sent to England, and, of course, continues true to the king, while the one left in America declares himself for independence. They fight on opposite sides during the war, but are finally united in loyalty to their country. While intended especially for boys and girls, the tale is not without interest for older people. [Harper & Bros. $1.50.]

Will o' the Wasp. A Sea Yarn of the War of '12, by Robert Cameron Rogers. This is a stirring sea tale of the times when our navy was making itself illustrious by victories on the high seas. The plot is ingenious and the adventures consistent. Except for an excess of cursing, which is no doubt true enough to the fo'k'sle of the time but is out of place in a modern book, and for its encouragement of pure bulldog love of fighting, which needs no encouragement, we commend this story heartily. It is at least thoroughly interesting and patriotic. [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.25.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

Mr. F. J. Stimson has well fulfilled a useful task in his Handbook to the Labor Law of the United States. It is intended for laymen rather than lawyers, and especially for workmen and labor organizations, in the hope of being useful to them in disputes with their employers. The questions raised by the huge growth of modern corporations and the extension of the factory system are very complicated and the law is rapidly changing, but its principles are already well established and find full illustration in the cases cited here. [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.]

Practical Points in Nursing, for Nurses in Private Practice, by Emily A. M. Stoney. This is an eminently sensible and practical book, fully illustrated and with addition of glossary and index. It is sure to be helpful, not only to trained nurses, who will find in it much assistance, but also to those who without special training are called to care for the sick, for whom it will prove a convenient book of reference, though by way of caution it should be said that there is much which is described in it which ought not to be attempted without special skill and training. [Philadelphia: W. B. Saunders. $1.75 net.]

Armenia and Her People, by Rev. George H. Filian. Mr. Filian is an Armenian and a graduate of Chicago Theological Seminary. He writes with patriotic enthusiasm of his own land and people and with quite natural indignation of the Turk. The English of the book is good, with only now and then a phrase or sentence that betrays that the writer is not to the idiom born. We hope the book may be widely read, for the Armenian question is not ended yet, and it needs to be kept before the minds of the people lest having been indignant they should grow cold. Mr. Filian's solution of the question, we may say, is added in a chapter of prophecy in which he predicted that the atrocities would cease until the czar is crowned, but goes on to prophecy that they will be resumed and that the battle of Armageddan will come in a final struggle between, on the one side Russia, Turkey and France, and on the other England, America, the Armenians and the Jews. [American Publishing Company. $1.50.]

NOTES.

—— The Institute of France has recently taken favorable official notice of a book by Rev. Dr. C. E. Stevens on the Sources of the Constitution of the United States.

—— The complete edition of the works of Mrs. Stowe which the publishers, Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin & Company, have long had in preparation is soon to appear and will be timely. For each copy of the large paper edition the author some months ago wrote her autograph, which will be a precious possession to the purchasers now that she is gone from us.

—— It is of course a tribute to our Lord that new attempts to write his life in modern form are continually appearing. We noticed recently that three well-known British novelists are said to have such a work in contemplation, and it is now announced that McClure's Magazine is soon to publish one by Elizabeth Stuart Phelps. We shall all be interested to see what new light Mrs. Ward may have to throw upon so familiar a subject, but we cannot help remembering that literary power is only one of the many requirements for so delicate and exacting a task.

—— It is the custom of The Congregationalist to review books exclusively in the interest of its readers, and the editor in charge seldom undertakes to go behind the criticism of the specialist to whom a book may be sent for review. It would be as impossible for him to do so as it seems to be impossible to avoid occasional offense by severe judgments too frankly expressed. We reviewed some time ago a book written by Rev. S. B. Goodenow of Battle Creek, Io., under the title of Bible Chronology, and the author complains that the review was "a gross and cruel libel" in that it declared the book, whose purpose was to prove the trustworthiness of the Bible chronology in the shape in which it has come down to us and the untrustworthiness of archæological and extra-Scriptural conclusions calling that chronology in question, "utterly worthless." Our reviewer, who is a university professor, is unfortunately absent and the book itself has passed out of our hands. Yielding to the request of Mr. Goodenow, who is an honored Congregationalist minister, we very willingly call attention to his offer that "any one who wishes to decide for himself whether the book is 'worthless' may obtain a copy gratis" by writing to him at the above address. As to the value of the book, that is a matter of scholarly opinion. It is not the custom of The Congregationalist to print any judgments about books except its own, which are never taken carelessly or at second hand. We cannot therefore, while stating the fact, as Mr. Goodenow desires, that the opinions of some other papers are much more favorable to his book than that of our own reviewer, consent to copy any of them here.

PASSING COMMENT ON THIS WEEK'S NEWS.

If the intelligence of the other nine-tenths of the jurors drawn in a southern New England city compares at all favorably as a whole with that of the one-tenth particularly designated, the local court ought to do some quick work as a result of the new appointments.

The comparative informality which characterizes social life in summer happily creeps into church life also, and we find Presbyterians, Baptists, Methodists and Congregationalists worshiping together in that fraternal spirit which we all claim but do not fully realize or enjoy till we put it into practice.

Full benefit of conditions tending to help the physical as well as the spiritual self is taken advantage of in a Michigan town, and it is a wonder how any persons in the community, church-goers or not, can deprive themselves of such fellowship on beautiful Sundays.

Some Connecticut churches are looming up in their memberships among the churches of New England.

The importance connected with the sending out from a church of a large number of members who become ministers is generally considered as a fact worthy of remark. It is also interesting to note in a Vermont item that those who become ministers wives are as carefully counted.

By a recent federation, in which there is a place for every worker, a New Jersey church presents a solid front for united efforts.

Three septuagenarians received to membership on confession is the happy news from a New Hampshire church.

An interesting instance of denominational comity has just occurred in a central New York city.

NEW ENGLAND.

Boston.

Seamen's. Rev. W. S. Alexander, D. D., of Philadelphia, formerly pastor of North Avenue Church, Cambridge, will preach at the chapel, 287 Hanover Street, every Sunday evening in August.

WEST ROXBURY.—South Evangelical. The church is open all the vacation season, and the pulpit will be supplied by Dr. A. H. Quint, Dr. A. H. Plumb and others. The pastor, Rev. F. W. Merrick, spends his vacation of five weeks at Lake George and Steuben, N. Y. At the last communion five persons joined by letter. As an evidence of the cosmopolitan character of the church, out of seven persons who joined the church at the May communion five came by letter, not one of whom was a Congregationalist. These new members came from the Baptist, Methodist and French Evangelical Churches.

Massachusetts.

SWAMPSCOTT.—First. Services celebrating 50 years of life for this church have been held during the past week. A reception to past and present members held on a beautiful lawn overlooking the ocean front, a prayer and praise service, with reminiscences from the older people of the congregation, and a special historical sermon by the pastor, Rev. G. A. Jackson, an extra communion service, and a Sunday school concert, at which Sec. George M. Boynton of the S. S. and P. S. spoke, have been some of the prominent features of the celebration.

WOBURN.—First. Last Monday Dr. Daniel March, pastor emeritus, reached his 80th birthday. In 1856 he was pastor of this church, and after a subsequent pastorate in Philadelphia he was recalled. He has thus been pastor of the church through 25 years or more.

MARION.—Rev. H. L. Brickett will spend his vacation at Chautauqua, N. Y. His pulpit will be supplied as follows: Aug. 2, Rev. W. H. Cobb, D. D.; 9, Rev. D. D. Marsh; 16, Rev. R. P. Gardner; 23, Rev. E. N. Pomeroy.

NEWTON.—Auburndale. The supplies for this church are: July 26, Dr. W. E. Barton; Aug. 2, Rev. W. E. Strong; Aug. 9, Dr. W. G. Sperry; Aug. 23, Rev. Calvin Cutler; Aug. 30, Rev. E. H. Rudd.

GROVELAND.—The late Elizabeth A. Kimball left $200 each to the church of this place and to any missionary society which her executor may choose.

Maine.

BANGOR.—Elaborate exercises took place at the laying of the corner stone of the Eastern Maine Hospital, July 15. Rev. G. W. Field, D. D., made the prayer. This institution will occupy a fine site above the city on the bank of the Penobscot.

MACHIAS.—The women have started a parsonage fund and hope to realize at least $100 by fall. The plan is to issue five cards to a captain, who keeps one and interests four friends to take the others, each card representing $1.

CUMBERLAND.—Rev. T. S. Perry and wife are here on a visit and narrated their experiences at Orange Park, Fla., where the A. M. A. school has been so broken up.

FAIRFIELD.—The Good Will Homes are to have a fine church edifice. Ground was broken with appropriate ceremonies July 11.

New Hampshire.

WENTWORTH.—During the summer months the pastor, Rev. T. W. Darling, besides his regular morning service at the church, holds two other preaching services in out-districts, one two miles distant at two o'clock and another two miles further on at four o'clock, reaching home in season for the evening service. The Sunday school is in a flourishing condition, reaching its largest attendance for the year on a late Sunday. For the first time in the history of the church the last communion service was held in the evening with a large congregation present. It is proposed to hold it in the evening hereafter.

HOPKINTON.—The new pastor, Rev. J. S. Curtis, is proving himself the right man for the place and steadily growing into the affections of his people. He is accustomed often to preface his sermon with a brief talk to the children, which has proved interesting and profitable, as shown by his past experience. One of his parishioners who is unable to walk sits, on pleasant Sundays, in her carriage by the open window and greatly enjoys song and sermon. At his first communion service one young man was received on confession to the church.

RYE.—The pastor, Rev. A. W. Mills, has been sorely afflicted in the death of his wife, July 4, after only a month's residence here. She had been in feeble health for some time, and it was confidently hoped that the change would prove beneficial, but no such anticipations were realized. He has the hearty sympathies of his people, as well as other friends, in his bereavement, which seems so untimely at the beginning of his promising pastorate.

CAMPTON.—Mr. Gardner Cook of Laconia, a former parishioner, has recently given to the church an elegant pulpit Bible. A contribution of $22 was lately taken up for Miss Ellen M. Blakely, a daughter of Rev. Quincy Blakely, for 24 years pastor of the church, for her work at Marash, Turkey, where she has labored as a missionary for 10 years.

WASHINGTON.—The vestry of the church has lately been greatly improved. The revival interest following the labors of the district workers last winter is still manifest in the town. Several persons are expected to unite with the church at the next communion.

PIERMONT.—A movement has been started to secure a fund for a new bell for the church, which is greatly needed. With help already pledged from friends outside the parish, a successful issue of the endeavor seems assured.

GREENFIELD.—The church edifice at present is undergoing much needed repairs. The pastor, Rev. P. R. Cogswell, after an illness of four months, has so far recovered as to be able to resume services.

BARNSTEAD.—Six persons were received to the church at the July communion on confession, three of whom were upwards of 70 years of age and the youngest 11. Five were baptized by immersion.

Vermont.

BAKERSFIELD.—The church is prospering wonderfully under the ministry of Rev. S. D. Angel. The parsonage has been painted and papered since his coming and a movement is now about to be made to remodel the meeting house. Beautiful lamps have been fitted up in the audience room.

WAITSFIELD.—The centennial of the church was held June 21-28. This was the first church of any denomination to be organized in the county, by Rev. Ebenezer Kingsbury. From it have gone out 12 ministers, and nine members have become ministers' wives. Addresses by former pastors and "sons of the church" were given. Reminiscences by former and absent members were read, and altogether it was an enjoyable time. Services closed with communion season and hand shakings long to be remembered.

Rhode Island.

PROVIDENCE.—Beneficent. Union services with the Central Baptist Church have been the custom for several years and continue this season. Their houses of worship look one another in the face across Weybossett Street.——Pilgrim. Rev. J. P. Hale, D. D., of Kenwood Evangelical Church, Chicago, will preach on the first two Sundays of August ——North. Rev. E. O. Bartlett will supply until September, during the vacation of Rev. F. H. Decker.

Connecticut.

NEW HAVEN.—Out of 112 jurors, just chosen, one-tenth are clergymen, 5 of whom are pastors of the several Congregational churches of the city.—— The work of razing the old chapel, one of the buildings of the historic row at Yale, has been begun, and soon a grass plot will mark the place where many famous men of this country have been to regular daily devotions. This removal makes the third within three or four years of the buildings to be swept away, and but three remain. The chapel has been used both for classrooms and lodgings for over 10 years.

CHESHIRE.—The pastor, Rev. J. P. Hoyt, has concluded two series of sermons occupying nearly six months—one on the Fundamental Doctrines of the Bible, the other on the Founders of Congregationalism. He preached on Church Membership, July 5, reviewing the additions to the local church during the 172 years of its existence and showing that the average number added was 14 yearly. One year 104 were received. Of 70 members uniting in 1866 only 12 are now connected with the church. This shows the changes in country churches.

HARTFORD—South. Dr. Parker is in Europe.—— Asylum Hill. Dr. J. H. Twichell is at Keene Valley in the Adirondacks.——Fourth. Rev. H. H. Kelsey is also in the Adirondacks, but being chaplain of the First Regiment will return the middle of August in time to go to camp with the State militia.——Pearl Street. During August the meeting house will be closed as is the custom, but the Endeavor Society and Chinese Sunday school will hold services as usual.

BRIDGEPORT.—South. The church edifice was trimmed with bunting and other patriotic decorations a week ago Sunday. In the evening the pastor gave an interesting discourse on the life and services of Samuel Adams, the Revolutionary hero. ——North. Prof. W. F. Blackman of Yale continues to fill the pulpit, giving good satisfaction.

WEST HARTFORD.—Special services were held a week ago Sunday in honor of the fifth anniversary of the pastorate of Rev. T. M. Hodgdon. The pastor preached an interesting sermon reviewing that period. In the evening special gospel services were held, led by E. B. Dillingham of Hartford.

WEST SUFFIELD.—Plans are being laid for the building of a new chapel next fall on the north side of the meeting house, and the making of a number of extensive alterations and improvements on the edifice, including painting and moving the organ downstairs.

MIDDLETOWN.—Union services will be held the first two weeks in August with South Church and the last two with North Church. It is expected that Dr. G. C. Adams of St. Louis will preach the four Sundays in the absence of both pastors.

LISBON.—The last of the six local conferences this year was held here July 1, with Rev. Q. M. Bosworth. The meeting was largely attended in spite of the hot weather, and was of unusual interest. Dr. W. S. Palmer of Norwich preached the sermon.

SOUTH COVENTRY.—The annual midsummer rally of the Connecticut Sunday School Association was held last week Tuesday. Large crowds were in attendance from all the surrounding towns, and the meeting was one of the most successful yet held.

WEST TORRINGTON.—Several decided improvements to the audience-room of the church have been made, including the lowering of the pulpit several inches, raising the aisles to a level with the rest of the floor, and the laying of a heavy new carpet.

GREENWICH.—First. The church at Sound Beach is one of the first in the State to provide a place for the storage of bicycles during church services. Arrangements have been made whereby the wheels can be stored in the basement.

NORWICH.—Broadway. Dr. Lewellyn Pratt will spend the month of August at Plymouth, Mass.——Second. Rev. C. W. Morrow will leave the last of this month for Lake Pocotopaug, East Hampton, Ct., where he will stay through August.

WILLIMANTIC.—The good citizenship committee of the local C. E. union has voted to raise $1,000 for the purpose of carrying on the proposed war against vice in this vicinity.

EAST GRANBY.—James R. Viets, one of the foremost men of the town, died last week at the age of 75. He was a lifelong member of the Congregational church and for 39 years was its treasurer.

IVORYTON.—Rev. L. S. Griggs will not resume preaching for some weeks, in order that he may fully recover. In the meantime the pulpit will continue to be filled by neighboring clergymen.

ANDOVER.—The offer to put in a new furnace by the women of the church has been accepted by the society. Extensive repairs are being made on the horse sheds.

ROCKVILLE.—Rev. C. E. McKinley of Yarmouth, Me., whose call was recently noted, has accepted and will begin his duties Sept. 1, just a year from the time the former pastor left.

The conference report of State registrar, Rev. W. H. Moore, just out, shows the Second Church of Waterbury to be the largest in the State with a membership of 956, the South Church of New Britain in consequence falling to second place with 934 members. The Fourth Church of Hartford comes next with 872 members, and the Dwight Place Church of New Haven is fourth with 805 members. The Second Church of Waterbury is now the second largest in New England, and the South Church of New Britain is third in size.

MIDDLE STATES.

New York.

SYRACUSE.—The synodical missionary of the Reformed Church started a mission last spring in what might be called the parish of the South Avenue Church. A protest was made by the State H. M. S. to the Domestic Missionary Society of the Reformed Church, and though a house had been leased, a student put on the field and services maintained for some weeks, the mission has been withdrawn on the basis of the conference and agreement of non-intrusion into a parish of the other entered into December, 1892, in New York by the Congregational, Presbyterian and Reformed denominations.

DE RUYTER.—A movement of considerable strength is under way in this town to organize a church. Rev. D. W. Bull of Pitcher was sent for recently to explain the polity and to advise in regard to steps to be taken for a Congregational church. The congregation is holding services in Russell Hall, prominent men are in the movement, and a Ladies' Aid Society of six members has already been organized.

BROOKLYN.—Rochester Avenue. The trustees have voted to recommend that the church grant them the right to sell their property and buy and build elsewhere. Later resolutions were passed by the church to grant such right. The trustees have an option on a lot 100 x 150 feet, where they expect to build in the near future. The present property is now for sale. Rev. A. F. Newton is pastor.

New Jersey.

EAST ORANGE.—First. The four ladies' societies have recently been federated and turned into committees of the one general Woman's Society for Christian Work. The committees are: the church aid, the foreign missions, the willing workers, and the twinkling stars. The new body now numbers 97 members, and the good work already done by it gives promise of large results in the future.

ELIZABETH.—The general interest in the church is good. Seven adults were received to membership at the last communion. Three hundred and fifty dollars have recently been paid on the debt, making $650 since Jan. 1.

MORRISTOWN.—The church is progressing peacefully. Twelve new members were recently received. The pastor will occupy his pulpit the whole summer.

THE SOUTH.

Alabama.

BLACKWOOD.—St. John. Missionary Stablings recently assisted the pastor, Rev. M. V. Marshall, in services for five days which resulted in an ingathering of 13, making a total of 20 in recent weeks, while others are yet to come.

KIDD.—Union. A gracious blessing came to this people July 5, which caused the farmers to forget their work and give the week to special services. The results already realized are seven additions by letter and seven on confession, with more to follow.

THE INTERIOR.

Ohio.

OBERLIN.—During vacation Prof. A. H. Currier supplies the First and Prof. H. C. King the Second Church.——Rev. D. L. Leonard, D.D., of this city supplies his old pulpit at Northfield, Minn., for a month.

Rev. W. G. Roberts of Hudson, Mich., is regularly supplying the Sylvania church.——Geneva is materially enlarging and improving its house of worship. ——Hampden church has been greatly quickened by a week's meetings of Evangelist A. T. Reed, and received two additions.

Illinois.

PORT BYRON.—At the close of his three years' pastorate Rev. R. W. Newlands has just reviewed that period and showed that 106 new members, 92 on confession, have been received. Mr. Newlands has now gone with several friends on a two months' bicycling tour of England and Scotland.

Indiana.

ANDREWS.—This church, almost disorganized by the forced changes of population consequent upon the Debs strike, is again showing some strength. Twenty-one new members have been received in six months. A Ladies' Aid Society of 24 members is rendering efficient financial assistance. The Sunday school is improving in numbers and discipline. It has adopted a systematic plan of benevolence, giving to each of the six societies. At a recent concert a model "Mayflower," 20 feet long, was anchored in the church and the Pilgrim history was told in song, costume and story.

INDIANAPOLIS.—Mayflower unites with the Fourth Presbyterian for the vacation. Rev. G. E. Hill supplies the united congregations July 19, 26. Rev. J. W. Wilson is with his family at Red Wing, Minn. His infant son Donald died on July 14.——Fellowship. Rev. F. M. Whitlock and Rev. O. D. Fisher of People's will remain at their posts, taking no extended vacation and keeping up regular services.——South and Pilgrim also maintain regular services, depending on supplies.

ALEXANDRIA.—Superintendent Curtis was here July 19. There was communion and reception of members. Rev. J. C. Smith is winning golden opinions from the people, and the church looks forward hopefully and is planning to secure the equipment of a lot and building.

TERRE HAUTE.—Second. Rev. W. F. Harding gives his vacation to Chautauqua work. He acts as Indiana secretary of the C. L. S. C. He goes first to an assembly at Eagle Lake, Ind., and then conducts the work at Macatawa Park near Holland, Mich.

Michigan.

ROMEO.—The churches of this place are holding union open air meetings during July Sunday evenings. A lot centrally located has been seated to accommodate about 400 persons, and the pastors preach in turn. The attendance has been unexpectedly large. Everybody is interested. The best of order prevails. The outskirts of the lot are thronged with carriages. Many people who never go to church are in the audience. The service lasts just one hour, beginning at 7 P. M. The singing is congregational and printed programs of song are distributed. Rev. E. C. Oakley is the Congregational pastor.

Wisconsin.

BELOIT.—A mass meeting of the Sunday schools of the city, held July 5 with the First Church, gave the initiation to a new movement undertaken by the city pastors for developing and improving Sunday school work. Rev. W. W. Sleeper presided and Dr. G. R. Leavitt gave the address of welcome. The schools came in procession with banners and the attendance was large.

THE WEST.

Missouri.

ST. LOUIS.—Pilgrim. Dr. Michael Burnham will spend a part of his vacation on the lakes and in the Northwest. The pulpit will be supplied as follows: July 12, 19, 26, Rev. Wolcott Calkins, D.D.; Aug. 2, Rev. G. E. Wallace, D.D.; Aug. 9, 16, 23 and Sept. 6, Rev. E. P. Terhune, D.D.——Bohemian. The official board of the St. Louis City Missionary Society at its last meeting authorized the committee on Bohemian work to make contracts for the erection of a house of worship. The architect is at work and it is expected that contracts will be let before July 24. The work will be under the direct supervision of Rev. A. L. Love, superintendent of city missions.

Iowa.

HUMBOLDT.—Fifteen members were added at the July communion. This makes a total of 43 accessions since Rev. R. L. Marsh was called to the pastorate in January. Of that number 27 have been received on confession. This increase marks simply the normal growth of the church, no special meetings having been held, except services during Passion Week. The meeting house, though the largest in the place, is far too small for the congregations. The attendance at the midweek prayer meeting is keeping up through the hot weather, with a continuous gradual increase, and the membership of both the Junior and Senior C. E. societies is increasing. This quarter-centennial year promises to be the most fruitful one thus far in the history of the church.

BUFFALO CENTER.—The condition of the church has steadily improved since the Cordner meetings, and interest is increasing under the leadership of the new pastor, Rev. N. L. Packard. Thirty-five new members have already been received and more are sure to follow in a few weeks. The audience-room is filled at the Sunday services, extra chairs being placed in the aisles. An effort is being made to pay off an indebtedness of $150, toward which over $100 already have been subscribed.

THOMPSON AND LEDYARD.—The new pastor, Rev. F. A. Slyfield, has introduced the envelope system of raising funds at both places. He has also organized a Ladies' Aid Society and Senior and Junior C. E. Societies. Several accessions are expected at both churches at the next communion.

RICEVILLE.—An effort is being made to pay off the church debt, with good prospect of success. The women raised $70 June 16 through an experience social, and July 4 they netted over $100 from serving dinner. Rev. L. M. Pierce is pastor.

TRAER.—The midsummer communion was a time of special spiritual blessing and there were four additions to the membership. Mr. G. M. Herrick gave a lecture July 19 to a delighted audience.

Minnesota.

MINNEAPOLIS.—Plymouth. Rev. Dr. G. H. Bridgman of Hamline University is supplying the pulpit for the present.——Lyndale. A former pastor, Rev. R. A. Hadden, has supplied the pulpit for two Sundays during the vacation of Rev. L. H. Kellar. A reception was tendered Mr. and Mrs. Hadden by their former flock.——Rev. George H. Wells, D.D., has returned from Japan and spent a day with his Minneapolis friends, who were all glad to see him. He is at present at Dover, Ill. He has enjoyed his trip to Honolulu and Japan, but is not completely restored to health.

LAKE PARK.—The coming of a new pastor has stimulated the church to secure a parsonage costing about $1,000. This puts the work on a stable foundation. The usefulness of the parsonage fund of the C. C. B. S. was never better illustrated than at Lake Park, where without its help it would have been impossible to secure a house for the minister either by purchase or by rent.

VERNDALE.—Since the coming of Rev. R. W. Harlow finances have improved, a choir has been organized, a prayer meeting started and, with some pressure from the H. M. S., long deferred obligations to the C. C. B. S. are being met. The pastor, a grandson of a Revolutionary soldier, delivered a patriotic address July 4.

HIBBING.—The work received some harm through the sudden departure of the missionary, but Rev. E. C. Lyons of Appleton at once took his place and a congregation is being gathered with prospect of good work. Hibbing is a mining town of 2,000 people in the iron region.

ANOKA.—Rev. H. N. Pringle has closed his work here and is spending some time in Kansas. The church has been greatly strengthened by his pastorate and he has won the affections of all. He has offered himself as a foreign missionary under the American Board.

CROOKSTON.—The house of worship has been repaired, electric lights and new carpet secured and other improvements made. Rev. H. P. Fisher has been investigating some fields that are calling for new work. He will spend his vacation in New England.

LAKELAND.—Rev. A. A. Davis has collected money sufficient for thoroughly renovating both parsonage and church. New life has been awakened in the church. A pound sociable has been held with large attendance and many gifts for the pastor.

MADISON.—The church has been pastorless for two or three months, during which time it has been raising money to pay the retiring pastor. A former minister, Rev. David Donovan of New Paynesville, is spending some time with it.

The foundation of the new meeting house at Walker has been laid. Funds are being solicited for the building, which will be erected at once.

Kansas.

WICHITA.—Plymouth. Although this church was reported as having received home missionary aid last year, it received none for itself. Under the plan for a single pastorate in the city, adopted in 1894, the aid granted to Wichita last year was for work done under the supervision of the Plymouth pastor, but outside his own parish. Plymouth Church is self-supporting and is enjoying peculiar prosperity.

OTTAWA.—Presbyterians and Congregationalists unite in the morning service through July and August. In the evening five churches join in union meetings held with the Baptist church. A delightfully fraternal spirit exists among both churches and pastors.

Supt. L. P. Broad is exploring the western frontier. Many of the new counties he has visited have unusual promise of fair crops, but some sections, including most of Wallace and portions of Ford and Meade Counties, will have no crops whatever. The spiritual condition of the frontier churches is excellent. The pastors are being pressed with calls to occupy new preaching stations and are complying to the extent of their time and strength. The home missionary tent is to be pitched on the prairie in the heart of Meade County, and meetings began there July 19.

North Dakota.

FARGO.—Rev. J. F. Dudley, D. D., July 12, gave a historical discourse upon the development of Christian work during the last 25 years in this city, which has just celebrated its quarter-centennial. He showed the wisdom of planting the work here and the results that have been achieved. Among other things he dwelt upon the fact that Fargo College originated in the plans of its founders with the first association of Congregational churches that met here, in September, 1882.

NIAGARA.—Supt. H. C. Simmons spent July 12 with Rev. W. B. Cunningham, preaching at Adler, an out-station 13 miles to the southwest, in the afternoon and conducting communion service at Niagara in the evening. Three persons were received to membership. This church has made excellent progress in the past few months, adding to the furnishing of its building and largely increasing the attendance.

MELVILLE.—Mr. Evan Halsall, a young Methodist, has commenced work here and at Edmunds, Pingree and Buchanan under favorable circumstances. He is welcomed by good congregations at each point. The field is an important one and includes a large number of people, although to care for it the pastor is obliged to drive over 20 miles and back each Sunday.

HILLSBORO AND KELSO.—Rev. N. P. McQuarrie, whose resignation will take effect Sept. 1, enters evangelistic work because he feels distinctly called to this form of service. During his pastorate the church at Kelso has been organized and a house of worship erected.

REYNOLDS.—A church of seven members was recognized by council June 30. It is cared for by Rev. J. D. Whitelaw, and is to be yoked with Cummings and Buxton.

PACIFIC COAST.

California.

SAN FRANCISCO.—Rev. C. O. Brown, D. D., who for some time has conducted an Independent church in this city, is about bidding farewell to his congregation, having accepted an invitation from one of his sons to spend the summer recuperating his health. Whether or not Dr. Brown will return is by no means certain.——Mrs. Sarah B. Cooper, who has been attending the General Federation of Women's Clubs in Louisville, Ky., has returned and assumed her usual duties, among them the leadership of the large Sunday school class now meeting in Native Sons' Hall. During her absence Prof. C. S. Nash of Pacific Seminary had charge of the class.——Rev. Frederick Flawith of Fourth Church is sojourning in British Columbia.

SACRAMENTO.—Mrs. H. N. Hoyt, the pastor's wife, has been greatly cheered by the success of her plan for mission study among the women. Six different circles have been organized, each taking a special field on which to read up and write papers. The meetings have had an average attendance of 27 and unusual interest has been manifested. Each group aims to raise $25 for the Woman's Board by Sept. 1.

SAN BERNARDINO.—Bethel. It has been decided to continue the work here. Rev. J. R. Knodell, pastor of the First Church, for the present will have charge of this work also.

CURRENT THOUGHT.

AT HOME.

It is gratifying to find the religious press of the country rising to its duty and stating in unequivocal language the real issue which voters face in this campaign. The Examiner says, "It is a question of honesty, integrity and national permanence . . . a bare majority against this conspiracy of dishonor is not enough." The Living Church believes that "the common sense and common conscience of the people will prevail." The Watchman holds that "if the Republican party is returned to power it will be charged with moral duties which far outrun its platform." It believes that "the great question of the hour is whether we can trust these radicals, some of whom avow theories that would drive them to the Paris Commune, to redress their grievances in their own way without regard to the equally sacred rights of others, and without regard to public faith or order." The Pilot dislikes the platform, confesses to some admiration for Mr. Bryan's personality, but refuses to advise its readers what to do. The Christian Intelligencer says that the Chicago platform "is so revolutionary and anarchistic, so subversive of national honor and threatening to the very life of the republic, that patriotism and loyalty to righteousness" constrain it to enter its vigorous and unqualified protest. The Independent says the principles enunciated at Chicago "are such as honest men, who believe that debts paid in bad money are debts in part repudiated and that mob rule is criminal rule, must condemn and reject as of the very essence of dishonesty and anarchy." The Jewish Messenger affirms that "Great as is our country, it cannot seclude itself from international commerce and the world's interests; its debts must be paid precisely as incurred, and its money must be acceptable for full value everywhere." The Northwestern Christian Advocate, being an official paper, is forced, it thinks, to hold "a compulsory neutral position," but it is easy to see that it sympathizes with the uprising of many of the Western people who voiced their opinions in the Chicago platform. The Evangelist, through Dr. H. M. Field, asks, Shall We Have Order or Anarchy?

Exit, the Spinning Wheel.

WOMAN'S WORK IN NEW FIELDS.

When the spinning wheel and the loom went from cottage to factory there began a world revolution not equaled by any overturning of an old order which civilization has witnessed. When cloth was no longer spun and woven and bleached and fashioned by home skill, but came from factories and called for a price instead of for effort at first hand; when baking and brewing and churning became great separate industries, like soap-boiling, candle-making, and a score of other tasks which had once filled woman's days to the full, civilization stood on the threshold of a great new era, compared to which those were unimportant times when slaves were turned loose into the condition of self-dependent freemen, and vast armies were disbanded after having forgot all crafts but the craft of war. History took on a new turn in this revolution, or evolution, to which almost no other can compare. The hands and hearts and minds of millions of women, born and yet to be born, stood ready for new occupations in large degree, and some of the gravest questions this old world has propounded stared in the faces of both men and women then, nor have they ceased their insistence nor their gravity even now.

In what may woman engage to do best justice to her powers and most good with them and suffer least detriment to her womanliness? We are told that there are over 2,000 occupations open to women today, as against only three to which they could turn a generation ago. The general aspect of the world today toward a woman at the bar or on the jury, for instance, is far different from what it would have been thirty years ago, but there are still thousands who are unreconciled to such conditions, and among womankind there are almost as many, proportionately, who view with dread the prospect of going into the world as bread-winners as there were a half-century ago. To these the first choice of occupation is one of the very first which opened to the woman in search of opportunity. Teaching is the nearest and dearest work to the truly feminine heart, and although it was one of woman's first resources it has been outclassed by none subsequent to it either in the extent of its demands or the rewards they offer. From the college presidency to the teaching of babes there is call in every field for the capable woman, but in no branch of labor, educational or otherwise, can women find a field so peculiarly their own as in the kindergarten.

Kindergarten! Beautiful word, suggesting the flowers of childhood and the tender study and love and care of the coaxing gardener, who is wise beyond the point where men expect roses to flourish under the same treatment as violets, but gives to each tender plant the care which, by minute, individual study, he has found it to be in need of. This branch of education is offering perhaps the most and the choicest inducements of any occupation open to women. It is a field in which they need feel no stress of competition except among themselves, for in it there can be none of the vexed strife between men and women such as works so sorely on the spirits of those women who choose the more advanced stages of educational work. In it, however, women find a vocation which is more than bread-winning, a calling next of kin to their crown of glory—motherhood. For that sacredest of offices it fits such as God may, in time, elevate thereto, and for those who may always find their work outside the walls of home it opens up opportunities of a depth and breadth and beauty any one might well envy. The science of child study, to which it has given birth and impetus, is assuming proportions and revealing charms which take captive the finest minds, and from being first misunderstood as a scheme for "amusing children," kindergartning has come to be recognized as one of the most subtly delicate and beautiful, as well as one of the most important, of all sciences.

From Mrs. J. N. Crouse, the director of the Chicago Kindergarten College, No. 8 East Van Buren Street, Chicago, Ill., where many of the best teachers in the country have been trained, it was learned that the demand for good teachers far exceeds the supply and that places are sometimes open for months looking for "the right woman." Further inquiry also brought out the facts that a knowledge of kindergartning is a strong recommendation for applicants for ordinary positions the country over, and that salaries may be said to be better in this than in almost any other branch of woman's work. For instance, teachers who have had but two years' instruction receive from $500 to $600 per year for services during half a day through the school year, and students who have had three or four years of theoretical and practical instruction receive from $800 to $1,500 per year. These, then, are some of the facts of one of the promising and honorable avocations open to women.

A GOOD child is usually healthy, and both conditions are developed by use of proper food. The Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk is the best infant's food; so easily prepared that inproper feeding is inexcusable and unnecessary.

Chicago as an Educational Center for Women.

The University of Chicago, with its great money endowments, its splendid equipments of special buildings for the natural sciences, its facilities for postgraduate work, its equal opportunities for men and women, has drawn the attention of the entire country away from the far East as the educational Mecca of students, and bids fair to change the educational center of the United States from New England to the southern shore of Lake Michigan. The single fact that this great university in its incipiency provided three commodious and finely equipped buildings for the accommodation of its women students shows the importance it attaches to their higher education, and sets a standard for their intellectual development such as no other city in the United States can boast.

It has long been known to well-informed people that the standard of intellectual culture among women in Chicago has for many years been the highest, and while it is well said that comparisons are odious, yet it is true that as long ago as the meeting of the Women's Congress in 1882, when the Chicago Woman's Club entertained that highly cultured and dignified body of women, the superiority of Chicago women as speakers, parliamentarians and in general ability to guide and inform audiences was generally and generously recognized. At that time a distinguished woman from New York city said: "I feel as if the Chicago women were a deep sea in which we Eastern women swim as small and unimportant boats."

The women's clubs of Chicago are the most numerous and enroll the largest membership of those of any city of the United States. They also contain the largest proportion of women who are college graduates. Two of these clubs, the Fortnightly, with a membership limited to 200, and the Chicago Woman's Club, with a membership of nearly 800, have very handsomely equipped clubrooms which occupy the entire fifth floor of one of the great business blocks in the heart of the city. Here, over a quiet cup of tea or chocolate, which can always be obtained on call, the best women of Chicago meet to discuss matters of general interest or to formulate plans for the humane and Christian enterprises for which they are so noted. The presidency of the National Confederation of Women's Clubs, with its 200,000 members, has, for the second time, been awarded to a Chicago woman, Mrs. Charles Henrotin, notwithstanding a vigorous attempt on the part of Eastern members to remove it to New York.

All the pupils of Chicago schools, public and private, have the advantages possessed only by great cities—of access to the great libraries of the city, to its Art Institute, now among the finest in the country, to its museums, which contain many of the most valuable things shown at the Columbian Exposition, to its great Academy of Science, etc. The musical and other entertainments are also an important factor in a liberal education for girls. The Thomas concerts continue throughout the winter season, and as the rehearsals are given on Friday afternoons they are attended by hundreds of pupils from the schools. The best musical artists come to Chicago every winter.

The great Chicago Conservatory of Music and Elocution, under the direction of Samuel Kayzer, with its finely equipped studios in the Auditorium and its corps of teachers in each department from the front ranks of the profession, offers the opportunity to the pupils of Chicago schools for education in all branches of musical and dramatic art which New York and Boston have until recent years monopolized.

A great deal of the credit of the general high standard of culture among Chicago women is due to the Chicago private schools for girls, which, ever since the great Chicago fire, have been doing singularly effective, if quiet, work. Among the twelve or fourteen long-established schools for girls in Chicago, only two receive more than twenty boarding pupils, none receive over thirty, while the majority receive only ten or twelve in the families of the principals. This restriction has had the effect of bringing the young girls who are boarding pupils into close personal relation to the principals of these schools, to the great advantage of these pupils, since among the principals of the private schools of Chicago are to be found women distinguished not only as educators but as scholars and writers to a degree scarcely equaled by any other city in the country.

Another interesting fact in regard to these private schools is that all may make a specialty of fitting girls for college, and every September witnesses the interesting spectacle of special trains for college students. Usually these trains are decorated with flowers, furnished by the officials of the various roads, and the young ladies leave Chicago for Vassar, Smith and Wellesley under the happiest auspices of attention and éclat.

One of Chicago's leading schools for girls is the Loring School on Prairie Avenue, founded in 1876 by Mrs. Stella D. Loring and Miss Howells, a sister of W. D. Howells. This school is now under the principalship of Mrs. Loring, a most cultured, scholarly woman, who, besides her large number of day pupils, receives into her family twelve young ladies as boarding pupils. The Loring School gives especial attention to college preparatory work, and its certificates admit to the leading colleges for women and co-educational universities without entrance examinations. At Mrs. Loring's home the pupils meet the literati of the city, as Mrs. Loring gives frequent evenings when distinguished people read papers or give musical recitals or meet with members of her family socially.

On Indiana Avenue, near Twentieth Street, are the two spacious buildings occupied by the Holman-Dickerman School, under the principalship of Mrs. L. C. Holman and Miss F. S. Dickerman. The course of instruction embraces all the studies included in a thorough English education, and especial attention is also given to the study of French. The school numbers among its pupils and alumnæ the daughters of some of Chicago's most prominent families. While this has been strictly a day school in the past, Mrs. Holman and Miss Dickerman intend receiving a few boarding pupils into their home in the fall.

Further south—for these are South Side institutions—is to be found the Kenwood Institute, on Forty-seventh Street, near the lake. The principal, Miss A. E. Butts, receives into her large and finely appointed home about twelve boarding pupils. This school has the distinction of being the only girls' school affiliated with the University of Chicago, thus obviating the necessity of entrance examination. A certificate from the principal of Kenwood Institute admits to the University of Michigan, the University of Wisconsin, Vassar College, Smith College and Wellesley College without examinations. Special attention is given to the study of art history, illustrated lectures being given regularly on this subject.

On Oakenwald Avenue, also near the lake, is Ascham Hall, a school for young ladies. The principal is Miss Kate Byam Martin, a sister of Mrs. Charles Henrotin. Miss Martin's school is noted for the attention it gives to modern languages and to art. Examinations for the University of Chicago are given quarterly at Ascham Hall. Miss Martin, having lived many years abroad, speaks French and German with fluency. She is the author of several well-known works of fiction and travel. Miss Martin receives twelve young ladies into her house.

Eight miles west of the city, but connected with it by numerous lines of electric and steam cars, in the beautiful suburb of Oak Park, is the Scoville Place School, Mrs. Helen E. Starrett, principal. This school is named for the gentleman whose spacious mansion, surrounded by five acres of lawn, the school has occupied since his death. On account of its size, large and finely furnished rooms for pupils and its general superior equipment, this school has been named the Ogontz of Chicago schools. It accommodates twenty-five boarding and one hundred day pupils. It is especially noted for the attention given to the use of good English in speech and composition. Its certificates admit to all the best colleges for women. Mrs. Starrett is well-known in the literary world, not only for magazine articles on educational topics, butfor several books on ethical and social subjects. Her Letters to a Daughter have been read by thousands of young girls during the past ten years.

Beautiful Kenilworth, a few miles north of Chicago, on the heavily-wooded bluffs overlooking Lake Michigan, possesses one of the most thoroughly equipped schools in the country, Kenilworth Hall. Within easy reach of the city by numerous suburban trains, with a most beautiful natural environment, are situated the home of Mrs. Babcock, the principal, and another building devoted exclusively to the purpose of recitation and study. Mrs. Babcock is an experienced teacher of widespread reputation. While, if desired, pupils are prepared for college, the special inducements offered by this school are delightful home associations and a most thorough course of study along general lines under Mrs. Babcock and a corps of competent assistants. Numerous graduates of Kenilworth Hall, prominent in society and literary circles, attest the thoroughness of Mrs. Babcock's training. Mrs. Babcock receives twelve boarding pupils into her home.

The truth is that Chicago, possessing its unsurpassed opportunities for general culture, with such finely equipped schools, offers inducements which are proving sufficient to cause parents to turn their eyes thither when considering the question of the education of their daughters.

THE INTERNATIONAL C. E. CONVENTION.

CLOSING SESSIONS, JULY 11-13.

WHAT IS THIS MOVEMENT?

Had the entire concourse at the great Saturday afternoon open air service adjourned to the meeting for citizens on the White Lof, the two tents which were in readiness for the evening program would hardly have covered one-half of the multitude. As it was, the streaming columns of humanity which took up their line of march from the Capitol to the Treasury were thinned out by the withdrawal of detachments all along the route, and at their destination were reduced from the tens of thousands to two fair audiences. The object of the gathering was the enlightenment of the general public as to the aims of Christian Endeavor, and the empty seats might have resulted from generous forethought on the part of many regular delegates in favor of their entertaining brethren and sisters. The words of one speaker were the thoughts of all: Christian Endeavor work is the process of leveling up—socially, intellectually, spiritually. The highest ideal is the standard up to which every life is encouraged to develop.

THE SUNDAY PROGRAM.

With a view to introducing no disturbing influences at the regular hours for Sunday worship and Bible study, the framers of the convention program left open the morning and evening hours, and the appreciative Endeavorers, interested in seeing Washington in its church home and at its church work, crowded the large and small edifices throughout the city. The afternoon hour appointed for denominational missionary rallies found good congregations in tents and churches in twenty-eight points of the city despite the hot wave which settled down with intensity on Sunday to remain through the sessions. At Tent Williston Dr. W. E. Barton, again representing the Congregationalists as chairman, introduced a strong list of speakers, among them Dr. C. C. Creegan, Miss M. W. Leitch, Rev. G. W. Moore and Rev. W. G. Puddefoot. Other bodies were led in thought to foreign fields by such able speakers as their ranks afforded, and the advance announcements for every meeting satisfied the delegates generally that their own denominational rallies were for them the most attractive.

The meetings for Sabbath observance in one of the largest halls of the city, and the citizens' evangelistic meeting in Tent Washington had stirring addresses, the former by Mrs. H. T. McEwen and Rev. Messrs. J. B. Davison, Alex. Alison, D. D., and W. F. Crafts; the latter by Rev. B. Fay Mills. The usual C. E. prayer meetings of the evening had the added inspiration of new voices from remote places—an inspiration which was further re-enforced by the eloquent pulpit utterances of visiting preachers at the evening worship.

THE WORLD FOR CHRIST.

The continuance of the subject of missions absorbed the attention of the last morning. This first meeting of the World's Christian Endeavor Union afforded a broader view of Christian work than any other session in the addresses of representatives from England, Germany, India, Africa, Persia, China and Armenia. While the introduction of other visiting missionaries from the field was in progress in one tent about forty volunteers for missionary fields stood before a great applauding audience in another, and in the third tent was being heard by a tremendous and most enthusiastic assemblage "a message from Armenia to Christendom." The speakers here were Rev. F. D. Greene, Van, Armenia, Miss Rebecca Kirkorian, Aintab, Turkey, Miss M. W. Leitch and Rev. B. F. Mills. From the first two, who had come back from the land of the sultan as "missionaries to Christendom," were heard such appeals for the "remnant of Armenia" as only eyewitnesses and broken-hearted sympathizers could utter. The half was not told, but only hinted at, yet the hearers shivered at the recital of the condition of "a whole nation waiting as sheep to be slaughtered." "Is not America responsible," asked a native of Armenia, "for what has happened on account of the very charity she has shown us?" At the close of her own address Miss Leitch called the native young woman to her side, and, throwing over her head and shoulders an American flag, besought her hearers to offer their help for the dying Christians. Faced by such an object lesson, and with the cries of the victims almost ringing in their ears, the persons present were visibly affected by sadness.

Rev. B. Fay Mills had ready an answer to the native girl's query, and went on to enumerate the causes and explain the present state of the relations between the Turks and their dependent neighbors. At his utterance that the blame lies to some extent at the door of the United States, there was a great outburst of applause and cheering, which was heard again many times. Whether the young Americans whose voices, calling for repeated denouncements of our Government, thrilled and whose handkerchief salutes electrified the speaker to a repetition of his words would have reiterated his phrases in the calm of a fair consideration may be questioned. But that hundreds, perhaps thousands, of the young people rose to their feet pledging their aid in raising funds at their homes for the sufferers was sufficient evidence of the impressions which were left with them.

RENEWED ALLEGIANCE.

The great session of the closing consecration service was distributed over the city in eight sections. Before each gathering a stirring sermon was preached, and then, as the roll of States and Territories was called, brief responses were read, sung or repeated, and the great convention of '96 was declared adjourned. It was not merely the close of a round of meetings, but it concluded as well a period of earnest prayer by an army of God's children; of Bible study, led by students of the Word; of evangelistic efforts, conducted in many places and at many times of day and night; of excursions to historic grounds; of bicycle runs and parades; of ascents and peregrinations. From all this and much more Washington has learned of what profit and pains it is to entertain an international convention of Christian Endeavor. San Francisco, '97, is the cry which will resound through the country next year. In 1898 Nashville will doubtless be the favored city, and even thus early our English visitors are urging us to familiarize our ears with "London in 1900." H. H. S.

POND'S EXTRACT for pain without an equal for forty years. Carries this prestige with every bottle.

A POCKET-CHAIR.—Every one knows the convenience of having a low table placed beside one's chair, so that a dozen useful articles are within easy reach at your elbow. An improvement has now been made over this idea, by which the table and chair are both united. The contrivance is called a "Pocket-Chair," and it is a Chinese invention; the chairs themselves being imported direct from China. They are on sale at the Paine Furniture Co., and cost only a few dollars. They are very luxurious.

SOLID

Is the basis upon which Hood's Sarsaparilla builds up the health. Unlike opiates, narcotics and nerve stimulants, Hood's Sarsaparilla builds permanent strength upon rich, red blood, vitalized and vigorous, loaded with nourishment for nerves and muscles. Hood's Sarsaparilla permanently cures scrofula, catarrh, rheumatism, nervousness and weakness, because it purifies and enriches the blood.

A NEW CHAIR.

Among the many ingenious and novel designs in our new Exhibition of Art-Stained Willow Furniture is this double-pocket easy-chair.

It is a charming piece of furniture. The seat is low and very deep, and the back rises to support the head and shoulders at an easy incline. The sides follow the line of the arms in comfortable reclining.

On either side is a deep, large pocket. Here may be stowed books, letters, newspapers, fruit, your wife's sewing, or any of the many articles which you want directly at hand.

Think of the enjoyment of such a chair on the piazza. It will do all the duty of an extra table. We cushion and trim the chair as desired. You have your choice of several styles of color finish, including the new, rich shade of grass green.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

The volume of general business continues light, smaller even than was expected, although expectations were not high. The political situation, the shrinking gold reserve, which is now down to $89,761,336, and the falling values of securities all make for extreme conservatism on the part of merchant and capitalist. To be sure, the decline in security values is largely the work of an organized bear party in Wall Street, but even though this is true, the fall in prices has its unsettling effect.

Although general trade is light, the business situation is in pretty healthy condition in this respect, that jobbers and retailers have operated cautiously and are not overstocked with goods, the bulk of the supply being in factory warehouses, where they are carried most easily. Hence, if the condition of affairs becomes absolutely acute, the mercantile people are in better shape to stand a strain than if they had goods piled up on their shelves and notes in payment therefore coming due.

Iron and steel prices have suffered a further recession, and the industry is in less satisfactory shape. Production of pig iron is being curtailed, but the current demand is so small as to necessitate, it would seem, a further curtailment. What is true of iron and steel is also true of woolen and cotton goods. As to the cotton manufacturing industry, however, the closing down on half time of 4,500,000 spindles in New England during July and August ought to help the situation materially by relieving it of the great glut of goods. Reports regarding the lumber market are also discouraging, it being said that dealers in Philadelphia have in some instances been obliged to take houses in payment.

Bank clearings in the United States for last week aggregated $955,000,000, which was three per cent. less than for the previous week, and a falling off of seven per cent. compared with the corresponding week of 1895. The speculative situation is entirely in the hands of the bear operators, and they hammer values in the stock exchanges with comparative immunity. The uncertainties of the immediate future are so great that large interests do not dare to buy securities, and the public is absolutely absent. The wicked bears are thus without opposition, and liquidation has been heavy enough to make the floating supply of stocks ample for borrowing purposes.

It has always seemed to me marvelous that through those two narrow slits in my head which we call eyes the whole stupendous panorama of the world can find room to enter my brain. Never was a tighter passage devised for so vast a procession.—H. H. Boyesen.

MRS. ELLEN M. MORSS.

"They rest from their labors."

So was it permitted to enter into her rest, Mrs. Ellen M. Morss, loving and devoted wife of Rev. G. H. Morss, on Monday, June 29 at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Dr. C. N. Allen, Moosup, Ct., whose faithful ministration she was permitted to receive in her last sickness.

For thirty-two years and a half she shared with her husband the joys and sorrows connected with the varied New England parishes he has served, entering heartily into his work, and supplementing that work quite largely at times in connection with the ladies' societies. Her Christian life has been a steady manifestation of a buoyant faith in Jesus Christ and in efforts to lead others to believe in Him. For the last four years she has been denied the outward active efforts in connection with church life and work. But though for most of the time a "shut in," she still labored by prayer and the spoken word as the opportunity was given, and rejoiced with the redeemed over successes in Zion. Among her last words were, "My work is done." Though she rests from her labors her works in their blessed influence will still follow her.

The funeral services were conducted by a ministerial friend whose visits were always welcome, Rev. S. H. Fellows of Wauregan, Ct., Wednesday, July 1, the interment taking place the following day at Lawrence, Mass.

SUSAN N. HAYES.

The death in Peabody, July 6, of this worthy woman, wife of Andrew J Hayes, at the age of 57 years, has left a great void in the hearts of all who knew her. A good wife, a devoted friend has gone. Ever ready to help those she saw in need, her memory is fragrant with a beautiful and useful life. She loved the house of God and the study of his Word, and her home influence was sweet and strong among the dear ones, who today mourn her loss and who ministered so tenderly to her wants through the weeks of her intense suffering and pain until the happy release came.

O, there at last, life's trials past,

THE WOMEN'S CONFERENCE AT NORTHFIELD.

BY ANN MARIA MITCHELL.

The little village of Northfield, which twenty years ago had nothing except its natural beauties to distinguish it from scores of other New England villages, is today an important factor in the religious life of this country. Every summer sees bands of earnest Christian men and women turning their footsteps towards its green hills and fertile meadows, where they find health and strength for body and soul,

The Young Women's Conference, which has just been held, July 10-20, at the seminary buildings at East Northfield brought together students from about forty colleges and other institutions of learning as well as many from the Christian associations of our cities. Nearly 400 delegates were registered of whom many expect to engage in active Christian work. The conference aims to bring together the members of the Women's Christian Association in the colleges and cities. The general charge was in the hands of Miss Price of the International Committee of the Y. W. C. A.

The Y. W. C. A., as Miss Price stated in one of her talks on association work, dates back to 1872, when a small band of Christian women in a college in Illinois united for informal weekly prayer meetings. These meetings increased in attendance and interest until it was decided to form a regular organization for Christian work to be known as the Young Women's Christian Association.

The morning and evening were devoted to the various Bible classes and meetings of the conference, while the afternoons were given to driving and various athletic sports as tennis, croquet and basket ball. Prof. Sallmon of Yale University gave a course of lectures on the Life of Paul, which was one of the most instructive courses of the conference. It was designed especially to aid those who were to conduct Bible classes but many others found inspiration in the fine scholarship and instructive power of this able teacher. His aim was to present to the class Paul, the man, living among the other men of his time.

Platform meetings, as they are called, were held in the large auditorium every day at eleven and eight. These were conducted by Mr. Moody. The singing was under the charge of Mr. G. C. Stebbins and was led by the Wellesley College Glee Club. At these meetings were heard such speakers as Mr. Speer, Dr. McKenzie, Mr. Torrey, Dr. Dixon, Dr. Pierson and of course Mr. Moody.

The seven o'clock meetings on Round Top are never forgotten by those once privileged to attend them. As the shadows of evening fall over the beautiful valley of the Connecticut the people gather on the grassy hillside to listen not alone to the words of the leader, but also to the silent teaching of nature.

Thursday was celebrated as College Day. In the afternoon the delegates marched into the hall with banners flying, and the cheers, if not quite so lusty as those given by the men a few weeks before, showed no lack of college spirit. The delegations from Wellesley, Smith, Vassar, Mt. Holyoke, Bryn Mawr and the other colleges made short speeches and sang their college songs amid the cheers of the audience. The most hearty welcome was given to four girls from the Indian school at Carlisle, Pa.

The question arises, What does this gathering together of these young women mean to the women themselves and to the world. In the first place it means careful, intelligent study of the Bible by scholarly, intelligent women. It means an inspiration to many to engage in personal Christian work, either in our own or other lands. Not the least important, it means rest for a season from the cares and anxiety of the world—not the rest of the fashionable resort, but what our Lord meant when he said, "Come ye apart and rest awhile."

HAY FEVER.

A Discovery for This Malady at Last—Relief at Your Own Home.

No one but the sufferer from hay fever knows the agony that attends this torturing malady. A continual round of sneezing, eyes that are weak, watery and inflamed, a nose that runs without cessation, and grows more sore every hour, inability to breathe, nights that become hours of torture, days that are long drawn out and full of suffering—and all this continues until the sufferer is obliged to pack up and go to some locality where this disease does not thrive. Formerly it was considered that the only way hay fever could be relieved was by a change of climate, the mountains of New Hampshire being noted as one of the best places in the world for this purpose. Now it is known by physicians and patients alike that sufferers of this trouble can be relieved at home by the use of X-Zalia. The preparation is an entirely new discovery in medicine, its merits for the relief of hay fever only becoming known within the last year or two.

X-Zalia is made from the sap of a certain tree, combined with other vegetable ingredients found in New Hampshire, and contains the necessary medicinal properties that have made New Hampshire air famous for the virtuous qualities it contains for the cure of this disease. Many sufferers who were skeptical have tried X-Zalia, and, to their surprise, found relief. Among those who may be referred to are Mr. W. F. Lakin, manager Consolidated Store Service Company, Fiske Building, State St., Boston; Mr. George E. Armstrong, of the firm of Clark, Ward & Co., bankers, Equitable Building, Boston; Mr. C. H. Stevens, Phillips Building, Boston; Mr. Walter L. Frost, 8 Congress St., Boston; Mrs. Wm. F. Richardson, 12 Elm St., South Framingham, Mass.; U. S. Senator J. H. Gallinger, New Hampshire.

It is expensive to take a long trip to the mountains for relief. It does not cost you much to try X-Zalia right here at home, and be convinced as to whether it does what is claimed for it or not. Ask your druggist for X-Zalia. If he does not keep it send $1 to The X-Zalia Company, No. 3 Beacon St., Boston, Mass., and they will send one of their largest bottles, express paid, anywhere on line of railroad in the United States.

AN IDEAL TOUR.—This term may certainly be applied to Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb's grand trans-continental trip announced for September. America's famous wonderland, the Yellowstone National Park, the finest scenery of Colorado and Salt Lake City are seen either on the outward or eastward journeys, a week being devoted to the National Park, and the Pacific Coast will be traversed from Victoria to San Diego—a stretch of over sixteen hundred miles. All the prominent resorts of California will be visited and the sojourn on the Pacific Coast may be prolonged if desired so that the tourist may taste of the joys of winter life in the golden land of fruits and flowers. A trip to the Yellowstone National Park and return is announced for the same date of departure as the California tour, and the firm have also arranged a numerous list of short summer and autumn tours. Send to Raymond & Whitcomb, 296 Washington Street, opposite School Street, for descriptive books.

Hay-Fever

and do it quickly. Don't wait until your regular attack has come—prevent it. Hyomei also cures by inhalation asthma, catarrh, bronchitis, etc. Don't dose the stomach to cure the respiratory organs.

Price by mail, $1.00.

Dear Sir: BROOKLYN, N. Y., Feb. 8, 1895.
Booth's Pocket Inhaler works like a charm. The first inhalation gave relief. It is a blessing to humanity and I am sorry it is not better known. I add my name to the "Pass-It-On-Society."
Sincerely yours, (Rev.) J. M. FARRAR, D. D.

Hyomei is a purely vegetable antiseptic, and destroys the germs which cause disease in the respiratory organs. The air, charged with Hyomei, is inhaled at the mouth, and, after permeating the minutest air-cells, is exhaled through the nose. It is aromatic, delightful to inhale, and gives immediate relief. It is highly recommended by physicians, clergymen, public speakers and thousands who have been helped and cured.

Pocket Inhaler Outfit, Complete, by Mail, $1.00, to any part of the United States; consisting of pocket inhaler, made of deodorized hard rubber, a bottle of Hyomei, a dropper, and full directions for using. If you are still skeptical, send your address; my pamphlet shall prove that Hyomei cures. Are you open to conviction? Extra bottles of Hyomei inhalant by mail, 50 cents. Hyomei Balm, for all skin diseases, by mail, 25 cents.

L. A. BOSWORTH, 36 Bromfield St., Room 18, Boston, Mass., General Agent for New England States.

TEMPERANCE.

—— Great Britain has 80,000 barmaids.

—— Mr. Bryan, the Democratic presidential candidate, is a total abstainer.

—— While Ireland's population decreased from 4,924 342 in 1885 to 4,584,434 in 1895, its drink bill increased from £10,497,084 to £12,035,917.

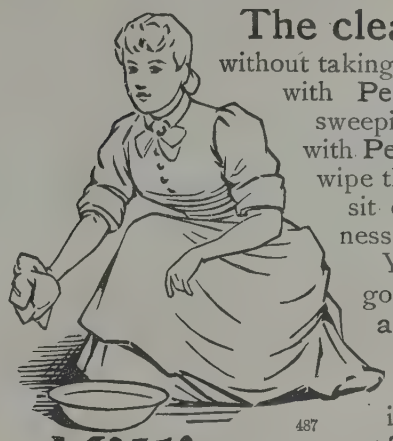
—— An English exchange rebukes the opportunism of the W. C. T. U. in South Australia which recently supported a candidate for premier because he favored female suffrage, ignoring the fact that he was a convicted adulterer and a lawless character.

—— The chief of police of Chelsea, Mass., has ordered all druggists, grocers and other citizens to cease selling malt extracts. Chelsea is a no license city, and as analysis of the malt extracts sold has shown a high percentage of alcohol the citizens and officials do not intend to have their wishes circumvented by any such trade of druggists and grocers.

—— It is interesting to note that Lady Henry Somerset, radical as she is, in her recent address to the National Temperance Association, discussing the Sunday-closing aspect of the problem, said: "So long as it is not practicable to close the club of the rich man, which is in effect his public house, I do not think we have any right absolutely to close the public house of the working classes, except by their own vote. . . . That every temperance refreshment house, coffee house and eating house should be closed as soon as Sunday dawns seems to me to be playing into the hands of the enemy in a way not in accord with the spirit of religion. . . . The whole question must be handled with exceeding care." Indeed it must. Dogmatism is exceedingly difficult and disastrous.

—— The Law and Order League of New Hampshire has lately begun the enforcement of the prohibitory law on a new line of tactics which seems to promise much for the future. It has inflicted on the traffic in Concord a blow which has brought great consternation into the ranks of the saloon-keepers, and as well to the owners of buildings rented for that purpose. The law known as the "nuisance act" makes the owners of such buildings equally criminal with the seller. After an injunction restraining them from allowing their premises to be used for saloons has been served, any violation thereafter renders them liable to be brought into court to answer the charge of contempt, and gives them no appeal from its decisions imposing fine and jail imprisonment. In several cases such injunctions were served months ago, and lately some of those guilty of violation have been summoned before the court and sentenced to a fine of $200 and sixty days in jail. This has hastened the closing, as far as known, of every public saloon in the city, it is hoped for all time. With a jail sentence staring landlords in the face, they will hereafter be slow in renting their buildings for saloons, and without a roof to shelter the traffic seemingly it must cease. Let the temperance people seize this favorable opportunity to put in operation such policy throughout the State, and we can see no reason why the prohibitory law should not prohibit.

DAY unto day uttereth speech concerning the good being done by Hood's Sarsaparilla. By the cures it is accomplishing, by the good health restored to men, women and children, Hood's Sarsaparilla wins its way more and more into the confidence of the people. Its army of friends tell of scrofulous and impure blood made rich and pure, of the relief it gives from the itching and burning of salt rheum, of the satisfaction at meals experienced by the former dyspeptic, of the happiness of those cured of malaria, rheumatism and catarrh, of excellent spirits and good appetite enjoyed by those recently weak, tired and run down. It is by such results as these that Hood's Sarsaparilla makes its hosts of friends and does its own most effective advertising. Its record of cures and the good it has done others are sufficient to warrant your giving this excellent medicine a trial.



The cleaning of carpets without taking them up. That is a specialty with Pearline. After a thorough sweeping, you simply scrub them with Pearline and water. Then you wipe them off with clean water, and sit down and enjoy their newness and freshness.

You ought to be able to do a good deal of sitting down, if in all your washing and cleaning you use Pearline, and so save time and work. Use it alone — no soap with it.

—ON—
Price Cutting.

THE TRUTH.

That the price of STEARNS Bicycles is maintained while nearly every other wheel is sold at a cut, either openly by the makers, or by the agent (whose large discount practically invites this method), is the best advertisement the Yellow Fellow could have.

THE MORAL.

When buying a wheel select a STEARNS of standard value first, and avoid those dire pangs of regret occasioned by knowing that another person may in two weeks' time from your purchase procure the same make wheel at a drop price.

THE CONGREGATIONALIST

Boston Thursday 30 July 1896

The John Robinson Memorial Church,

GAINSBOROUGH, ENGLAND.

Father, to Thee this fane we raise,
In memory of a sainted soul;
His mind was free, his heart was whole,
Be thine the praise!
His witness to the truth and right
Abides, a quenchless day-beam shed
Upon us, from the fountain-head
Of heaven's own light!

No menaces of hostile power
Availed with him, to hold back aught
Thy Word disclosed, or bind his thought
Enchained an hour.
And for his latest testament,
He bade us keep an open mind,
Assured the wealth Thy Word enshrined
Might ne'er be spent.

For him, and all who like him prest,
Before us, toward the mark, be told
Our God's high praises, while we hold
Their memories blest!
O may their mantle on us fall!
And may Thy grace our souls endue,
That we may live our lives as true,
And free from thrall!

And from this house we build for God,
Long may the glory of the Lord
Shine out, and his victorious Word
Sound forth abroad;
Battling with error, vice and sin,
Casting down every evil thing
Abhorred of God, till Christ shall bring His kingdom in!

The hymn composed for the exercises in connection with laying the corner stone June 29, 1896, by Rev. W. T. MATSON of Portsmouth.

EDUCATION.

—— David Y Comstock, A. M., for eighteen years instructor in Phillips Andover Academy and late master in the Hotchkiss School, Ct., has accepted the principalship of St. Johnsbury Academy, Vt.

—— The Field Columbian Museum of Chicago will receive $2,000,000 more from Mr. Marshall Field if its trustees accept certain conditions he has made respecting the transfer of the site nearer to the center of population and life.

—— Abbot Academy, Andover, was visited by a serious fire, July 24, when Draper Hall was damaged to the extent of about $10,000. The hall is one of the finest of the academy buildings, and was erected only five years ago. The loss is fully covered by insurance.

—— On Commencement at Lake Erie Seminary, Painesville, O., it was announced that the sum gathered by trustees and alumnæ for the new science hall amounted to $14,000. An unknown friend stands ready to add $10,000 as soon as $20,000 are raised, and thus equip the building.

$25.00 IN GOLD | GIVEN AWAY

Who can form the greatest number of words from the letters in CONTESTANTS? You are smart enough to make fifteen or more words, we feel sure, and if you do you will receive a good reward. Do not use any letter more times than it appears in the word. Here is an example of the way to work it out: Con, cost, coat, coats, on, test, tests, to, eat, etc. The publishers of WOMAN'S WORLD AND JENNESS MILLER MONTHLY will pay $10 in gold to the person able to make the largest list of words from the letters in the word CONTESTANTS; $6 for the second largest; $5 for the third; $3 for the fourth, and $1 to the fifth, and a lady's handsome American movement watch for each of the seven next largest lists. The above rewards are given free and without consideration for the purpose of attracting attention to our handsome and valuable ladies' magazine, twenty-four pages, ninety-six long columns, finely illustrated, and all original matter, long and short stories by the best authors; price $1 per year. It is necessary for you to send 12 two-cent stamps for a three-months' trial subscription with your list of words, and every person sending the 24 cents and a list of fifteen words or more is guaranteed an extra present by return mail (in addition to the magazine) of a large 100-page book, "Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush," by Ian Maclaren, one of the most fascinating books of the age. Satisfaction guaranteed in every case or your money refunded. Lists should be sent at once, and not later than August 20 (time extended, positively closes August 20), so that the names of successful contestants may be published in the September issue. Our publication has been established nine years. We refer you to any mercantile agency for our standing. Write now. Address J. H. PLUMMER, Publisher, 905 Temple Court Building, New York City.

ONE of the most important functions of The Congregationalist's Pilgrimage was devolved upon it by the National Council at its session in Syracuse last October, in the request that it represent American Congregationalists in the laying of the corner stone of the John Robinson Memorial Church at Gainsborough. So striking and important an occasion as the demonstration there, June 29, deserves to be fully understood and held in memory by the great host of Christians on both sides the Atlantic who look upon Robinson as one of the fathers of their faith. We have therefore considered it highly desirable to put before our readers the full text of Ambassador Bayard's notable address. Aside from its interest as the leading literary feature of a memorable day in the history of English Nonconformity, it possesses permanent value as a historical document marked by great learning and insight, and discussing themes of vital concern to all the churches of Christ. It is also fitting that the same number of our paper which contains this address should present a picture of the church that is to be builded in honor of the man who, it is generally believed, was born at Gainsborough. At this place, too, the parent Congregational church in northern England was formed. In a future issue we shall publish a letter from one of our own staff describing the events of the day in detail. So crowded has every day of The Congregationalist Pilgrimage been with important and delightful events that it is impossible for the weekly correspondence to keep abreast of the various happenings.

A new missionary was sent out under the auspices of the American Board last week. This would not be a startling announcement in ordinary years, when from thirty to fifty recruits are sent annually to the front. But, in view of the fact that it is ten months since one has gone, the news becomes extraordinary indeed. It gives a more vivid idea, too, of how the hard times are affecting our beloved foreign missionary society. Nor would this modest re-enforcement have been possible unless special provision had been made. The young man who goes is Alfred L. Shapleigh, M. D., a graduate of Harvard University in 1892 and of the medical school as well, who has taken in addition a special course in homeopathy. His father, Samuel B. Shapleigh, one of Boston's most substantial and consecrated Congregational laymen, sends at his own expense the young man and his bride, a Worcester young woman, and will support them on the field, their destination being Tientsin or its vicinity. Happy the father who can thus send, and is disposed to send, his only son to the front! We congratulate him and the Board which reaps such advantage from a generous man's concrete investment in foreign missions. Thus to help the cause at a time of great discouragement and depression is to infuse new courage all along the line.

One compensation for the slackening of activity in the churches occasioned by the summer is the opportunity for Christian fellowship through union meetings of various sorts. We are impressed more than ever this year with the fact that churches in given communities are combining, either for both morning and evening services on Sunday or for a part of the day. Nor is this joining of forces confined to churches of the same denomination, for our news columns report from week to week not a few instances where the union embraces representatives of several different denominations. It is perhaps as important often to demonstrate in this way the fellowship of churches of the same order as it is to bring together members of different evangelical communions. It too often happens that churches of the same order live almost side by side with hardly any expression on the part of either of that friendly interest in one another which ought to exist and usually does exist. And while those who stay at home are being brought closer together, the frequenters of the summer resorts whose religious life seeks expression are finding common ground with others who love our Lord Jesus Christ. Summer conditions, then, may become a valuable factor in promoting church unity.

One of the leading Reformed (Dutch) churches of New York is reported to have put in the hands of an attorney the data wherewith he can proceed to collect back pew rents due the church. Critics of the rented pew system may see in this another argument against barter and rental of sittings in houses dedicated to the worship of God. Those not so minded will doubtless deplore the publicity incident upon such a proceeding, and at the same time agree with the official of the church, who declares:

> I believe that where a man is abundantly able to pay and declines to do so when requested, then he should be made to pay. The church does not expect members to make payments when unable to do so; but there are men who live in fine style, own fine homes, drive elegant turnouts, and in other ways show that they have ample means, who allow their pew rents to run behind, and give no attention whatever to requests made them to settle their accounts with the church.

The meanest sinners are sanctimonious sinners.

A reader, incited thereto by our recent chronicle of the fact that the British House of Lords had passed the bill permitting and legalizing marriage with a deceased wife's sister, asks: "Why should there be any opposition to such a bill? What have the Anglican and Roman Catholic clergy to say in opposition?" We have read the arguments used in the debate that preceded the test vote and fail to find any substantial reasons advanced by the Anglican spiritual Peers, but the Duke of Argyll in his speech fell back on the Jewish code and its acceptance by the Christian Church, and he laid down the proposition that ties of affinity are equal to ties of consanguinity. The Duke of Argyll's contention respecting the authority of the Jewish code was challenged by the friends of the bill, and the Earl of Kimberly made the clever point that

> It was not possible to pick and choose with regard to the marriage law of the Jews. If there was some law which prohibited marriage in affinity as morally wrong, how could any religious man adopt a code which actually enforced that in certain cases a man must marry his brother's widow? What in Levitical law did not suit the argument of the noble duke [Argyll] he put on one side. What then became of the boasted logic? As to the bishops, no one would think of treating them unfairly, but it would be a very dangerous thing if the opinion of a large majority of the laymen in that House was permanently over-ridden by a minority composed of the prelates.

The New York Observer quotes the late Dr. William Henry Furness of Philadelphia, who was a graduate of Harvard Divinity School in 1823, as saying that he had a "hearty dread of being settled in Boston, whose church-goers had the reputation of being terribly critical, and rhetoric was then and there almost a religion." It adds, bringing the matter down to the present time: "We do not suppose that Boston has a monopoly of this craze for a cheap literary or 'ethical' substitute for a thoroughgoing, deep souled faith. There are many other bidders for this 'religion' of rhetoric." Nothing could be further from a correct picture of our Congregational Boston churches. There is no city in America, we believe, where there is more demand or appreciation for simple gospel preaching, and none where mere intellectual subtleties or "cheap literary substitutes for a thoroughgoing deep-souled faith" find a poorer market. A high average of culture, Brother Observer, leads to discrimination and an abhorrence for shams. When you come to Boston, therefore, bring your simplest sermons with you and you will find them appreciated.

The peril of missions is in the unfaithfulness of nominal Christians. "If you were as good as your book you would win all India in a generation," said a Brahman. On this matter we have the recent testimony of the prime minister of Japan, the Marquis Ito, in an interview reported in the London Daily News and summarized by the Methodist Times of London. After speaking of the reaction from the earlier tendency to Europeanize the country, he went on to say: "You sent us missionaries, who told us we were immoral. Possibly, but what about the lives of many of the English merchants living here, or the English tourists who visit our country?" The witness of character is the effective and enduring witness, and in the long run speaks louder than sermons. Immoral travelers and merchants will have much to answer for in Japan, as in all the ends of the earth, where they undo the work of the missionary by their false witness to the effects of Christian teaching.

THE LEGAL TENURE OF A PASTORATE.

In Massachusetts, and measurably in other parts of New England, judicial decisions have abundantly passed upon the tenure of the pastorate. Between a pastor installed by council and the society over which he is installed there is a contract. That contract interprets itself. If it has peculiarities, such as a provision that either party may terminate the connection by giving three months' notice, or if the connection is expressly limited to a period of five years, such provisions will, of course, be binding. They are part of the contract. But such provisions take the pastoral connection out of the ordinary Congregational theory, and it is not necessary for our present object that we consider them.

We may notice, in passing, that the notion that a minister settled by council can be dismissed only by council is incorrect. If the two parties agree to dissolve the connection unconditionally and simply by mutual consent, then the connection will be so ended. To say otherwise would be to say that the pastor and society could not separate without the consent of the neighboring churches, which would be absurd. If a pastor makes an unconditional resignation, to take effect at a specified date, and that resignation is unconditionally accepted by the society, then at the date mentioned the contract is ended and the connection ceases. We use the word "society" purposely, because when church and society both exist the legal contract is with the society, and whatever share may be allowed to the church by courtesy has no legal force.

When a pastor is installed over a society in the usual method, viz., by a call to the office and an acceptance thereof, and an agreement as to his fixed salary, with the usual concurring action of a mutual council of churches, the courts have decided that the contract is unlimited as to time, and that it can be broken by either party only for substantial cause. We believe that no decision has reversed the old precedents. In fact, so far as the minister is concerned, he is settled during good behavior, and his salary cannot be reduced without his consent below the contract agreement. The attempt to remove him at the will and pleasure of the society is futile. Equally useless is the attempt to reduce his salary. He can appeal to the contract. These various points have been stated by the courts in a series of unvarying decisions. We are inclined to think that few of our churches are really aware of the legal tenure of the pastorate as we have now stated it.

But how can such a contract be abrogated by a society without the consent of the pastor? We have used the words "good behavior," but they are to be understood with great caution. The petty fault-finding often prevalent in a congregation, the gossiping of busybodies, or the dissatisfaction of a few persons accustomed to rule, do not establish a legal ground for forcibly dismissing a pastor. Reasons must be alleged which law recognizes, as expounded by our courts.

The obvious method of securing a dissolution of the pastoral connection is by requesting the pastor to join in calling a mutual ecclesiastical council to advise in the case. But he may refuse to agree to this course. He can safely do so unless the society specifies one of the three grounds which the courts have declared to be the only specifications which have any force. These three are (1) essential change of doctrine, (2) gross immorality, (3) or willful neglect of duty. One of these three must be specified in the request by the society to the pastor. He is entitled to a knowledge of the society's complaint. If neither of these is specified he can refuse to join in calling the council, stating, however, distinctly his reason for refusal. His refusal is not "unreasonable" in this contingency, and the society cannot proceed to call an ex parte council. If it should call such an one such a body would be a legal impertinence with no right to exist, and one whose result would be worth exactly its weight in waste paper.

It will be seen that a society is, in our ordinary system, at the mercy of the pastor if he determines to adhere to his contract. The decisions also give great allowance to a pastor's weaknesses and infirmities, and are far from establishing rigid tests. In fact, there is rarely an instance where either of the three allegations could be maintained. The decisions do not seem to pay any regard to a general want of success. Spiritual interests may greatly suffer and financial interests may be prostrate, with no apparent redress.

It has not perhaps been sufficiently noticed that the omission of installation in many of our churches is due precisely to the determination not to be put in so helpless a condition. The churches prefer to employ a pastor by such a contract as makes it terminable at will. Suits at law have made some societies understand what installation means. Others have witnessed the result. Hence not a few have endeavored to obviate the difficulty, and yet preserve installation, by putting into the contract a proviso that either party may terminate the connection by giving three months' notice. This is effective, but it practically destroys our old Congregational methods by ignoring the dismissing council. It leaves the minister without a certificate of good standing, and it exposes him to grave suspicions. We venture to suggest a modification which will preserve reasonable liberty and yet preserve the value of the council. It is this, to insert in the call that either party may terminate the connection upon three months' notice, provided such separation be advised by a mutual ecclesiastical council to the calling of which each party agrees to join upon the request of the other party. The relief of this course consists in the fact that neither party can refuse to join in calling a council upon the general advisability of a separation, although neither of the three reasons which we have mentioned is alleged.

We are aware that it may seem indecorous to insert in a call a provision which looks towards a separation. But, considering that human nature is not yet perfectly sanctified, we do not see any better method of avoiding the great neglect of installation. We have in mind not a few churches which will never again settle a minister on the old plan, and we have given plainly the reasons for their course.

THE LESSON OF THE BURNS CENTENARY.

In reviewing the utterances of speakers and writers in connection with the centenary of the death of Burns, it is clear that it is the essential manliness of the poet which appeals to us and makes an undisputed and unequaled place for him in the heart of the English-speaking people. Under whatever aspect his life and work were considered last week, it was always a warm affection for the man that found expression. The blood of our common humanity coursed swiftly in his veins, and whether he sings of love or religion, sits at the tavern, laughs at hypocrisy and cant or moralizes over the simple beauties of his narrow world, we condone his errors and forgive his occasional bitterness, because we feel that he was our brother in trial and enjoyment, in love and sorrow, doubt and faith. So strong is character coming to expression in a simplicity which startled and delighted an artificial age to appeal to all the after ages.

This simple and powerful human character had a higher claim upon us, which here and there in the recent celebrations was overlooked or neglected. Burns was a great artist as well as a sympathetic man. The great poets are interpreters—of God to man, of humanity to its unthinking children, of God's world to those who live in it and use it for ignoble or necessary purposes, but are blind to its higher meaning and suggestion. Burns knew how to say what other men had thought and felt, and more, but all with heart-winning simplicity. When will our poets and artists learn the lesson that is written large upon the century during which his poems have delighted the world? We look for subtleties, we search for unnoticed delicate relations and unfamilar scenes. We produce mannered and slight or affected works of art which have no blood of life in them. But here was a man who had the courage to look at life simply and to speak what he saw and heard in the language he had learned at his mother's knee. He too has left us dull and mannered work, but it was only when he turned from his native Lowland Scotch to imitate in lifeless English the style of others. Artificial verse we have always with us, but another poet of the style of Burns we shall not have until, out of a simple life, a man arises to whom God has given both the gift of song and courage to express it simply. And the lesson is a lesson for all art and eloquence.

SUCCESS FROM ABOVE.

They who received the baptism of the Spirit for witness and for service were all with one accord in one place. Under the shadow of the cross and in the full light of the resurrection the old variance of aim and disputing about precedence were forgotten. Memory and promise and expectation made them one. The place of meeting was probably that upper room which had been the gathering place before the crucifixion, the company were those who had believed and had been counted worthy to see the Lord after his victory over death, the one accord was in memory of what Jesus had been to them and assurance that his promise was about to be fulfilled.

Then came the sign from heaven, and those who had been waiting unnoticed in the crowded city became, in a single hour, the most aggressive and successful force in the community and the nucleus of a movement which has transformed the world. Success came from above to those who were ready to receive it. Surely here are suggestions for the needed advance of efficiency in the life of the individual and of the church. The heart at one with itself, resting on Christ's pledged word and looking eagerly yet quietly for the next step of personal experience in service is in the attitude in which the Holy Spirit's power may be expected.

Distracting cares, unbelieving hurry, discontent with God's providence taking the place of dissatisfaction with the evil of the world, these must always hinder his coming in power to make us instruments of service. When the church is divided by conflicting ambitions, so that, meeting in one place it does not meet with one accord, when worldliness comes in like a flood and service is subordinated to show, while the conventions of society are made the test of cordial fellowship, the church needs the quiet of the upper room with its memory and expectation before it can be equipped for service by the anointing of the Holy Spirit. When we are ready we may be sure that the power from above will not be denied.

VARIETIES AND EVILS OF PROFANITY.

Strictly speaking, profanity means taking the divine name in vain. But there is a looser and more inclusive sense of the term which covers many exclamations and other expressions in which God's name does not occur yet which are usually and often gravely evil. In this larger meaning profanity is exceedingly common, and in its narrowest and worst interpretation it greets our ears daily.

Strong feeling naturally chooses intense language and vigorous exclamations are natural and need not be objectionable. Nevertheless it is a conspicuous proof of Christian refinement and self-control to avoid them, unless in rarely exciting circumstances. Frequent use of them lessens the impression which they make and testifies less to the justness of our emotion than to our impetuosity and lack of self-possession. We all know persons from whose lips superlatives have no special force simply because they are uttered so habitually.

Of course it is sinfully irreverent and harmful to use the name of God in common ejaculations, such as the angry outbursts of the profanity which so often shocks us. But the many less offensive yet really profane words and phrases which are so common need to be avoided with almost equal care. Many are mere imitations and evasions of their more objectionable kindred, as if one wanted to curse outright but did not dare to. Probably they sometimes testify to a spirit within as obnoxious to God as that which boldly blurts out the worst sounding words.

Christians need to be much more on guard in this particular than most of us are. We need not confine ourselves to the "yea" and "nay" of the Quakers. But we cannot be true disciples of him from whose lips no evil ever fell unless we are masters of our tongues and of the emotions behind them. Ordinary self-respect should restrain us from every form of profanity, and Christian principle should lead us to abhor it. Our most justifiable excitement, whether it be gratification or indignation, needs no harmful language in which to find expression.

CURRENT HISTORY.

Mr. Bryan Indorsed by Populists and Silverites.

The process of disintegration and reintegration now under way throughout the land will be much accelerated by the action of the two conventions held in St. Louis last week. While there is a nominal union of forces favorable to the free coinage of silver at the ratio of sixteen to one, irrespective of international agreement, it remains to be seen whether the agreement will be more than nominal. There is not the slightest question but that the Populist nomination of Mr. Bryan and the indorsement of the Democratic convention's platform will accelerate the movement of gold-standard Democrats toward one of three courses, either absence from the polls on election day, or the nomination of and voting for Democratic candidates who are less radical than Messrs. Bryan and Sewall, or temporary or permanent alignment with Republicans in support of Mr. McKinley and the gold standard. The fact that the Populist convention rejected Mr. Sewall and substituted Mr. Thomas E. Watson of Georgia as its candidate for vice-president serves to accentuate the difference between Mr. Bryan and Mr. Sewall, and instantly compels the former to settle a question of honor, which, if it is not settled squarely and creditably, will injure Mr. Bryan. Indeed, as soon as the Populist convention, disregarding all precedent, had selected its vice-presidential candidate first, Mr. Bryan saw that he could not with honor seem to consent to such repudiation of Mr. Sewall, and instantly sent word to the effect that he would not accept the nomination of a convention which proceeded thus. Since his practically unanimous nomination on the first ballot, he says that his acceptance of the nomination will depend upon the conditions imposed by the convention and accepted by his managers. Upon his final decision and action on this important matter depends more than can be well set forth in a few words. That Messrs. Bryan and Sewall were nominated by the convention of the national silver party is not surprising. Being composed chiefly of Western men, formerly Republicans, who have left that party because of its refusal to substitute silver for gold as the standard of value, it was natural that it should indorse the Chicago candidates and platform. The fact that the chairman of this convention was Mr. William P. St. John, until very recently the president of a New York city bank, is significant, but even more so is the statement that he is to be treasurer of the National Democratic Committee. This fact taken together with the other fact that the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, Senator Jones, was as influential in shaping the outcome of the Populist convention as any other one man reveals how substantial is to be the union of the friends of silver.

Gold Standard Democrats.

Representative and veteran Democrats, believers in the gold standard, from Illinois, Ohio, Indiana, Wisconsin, Kentucky, Missouri, Texas, Iowa, Minnesota and Nebraska, met in Chicago last week and decided to arrange for the calling of another national Democratic convention, to be held not later than Sept. 2. The reason formally assigned for this significant action is found in the following preamble to the resolutions adopted by the conference:

> In view of the revolutionary actions of the recent Chicago Convention, its repudiation of all Democratic platforms and principles and its condemnation of the national Democratic administration.

Sentiment in entire accord with this declaration is so strong throughout the country that it is practically certain that within six or eight weeks there will be another Democratic national ticket, and gold-standard Democratic State and congressional nominations and tickets as well. Democrats who have the most genuine desire to see Mr. McKinley elected are numbered among those who believe that such action will contribute to such a result, and all agree that it will tend to stay a very perceptible drift of the rank and file, the mere partisans, toward Bryan and Sewall; and at the same time save the Democratic party's standing in the North and East and contribute toward electing a sound-money Congress. The action of the Massachusetts Democratic State committee last week shows that ex Mayor Matthews of Boston is to lead in a fight against the proposed domination of the State convention and machinery by Mr. G. Fred Williams and the silver faction. Mr. Winslow's refusal to stand as Democratic candidate for governor in Maine, with a State platform pledged to a gold standard and a vice-presidential candidate from Maine and national platform pledged to silver, compels the rank and file of that State to cease straddling and face the issue. In New York the State Democracy and Reform Democrats propose to bolt and fight the Chicago verdict, whatever be the decision of mere politicians like Mr. Hill and Mr. Whitney. The fact that Secretary Hoke Smith of the Cabinet has ordered his paper, the Atlanta Journal, to support Bryan and Sewall simply shows that he has regard for his bank account; it does not show that he has changed his opinions.

The Gold Reserve.

When we went to press with our last issue the gold reserve of the national Treasury had fallen to $89,761,336, owing to shipments abroad and hoarding by timid citizens at home. Now, thanks to the resolution and wisdom of bank officials in the larger cities, who have deposited about $15,000,000 in gold in the sub-treasuries in exchange for legal tenders and have refused to execute the orders of correspondents desiring gold, the gold reserve has risen to $105,073,919, and bids fair to remain above the $100,000,000 limit so long as the firms which ship gold abroad abide by their agreement of last week, and so long as the bank officials betray a like conception of their duty to aid the Treasury and forestall a panic.

Individuals, as well as corporations, have a duty in this particular which they cannot escape performing, and if the way to do it seems obscure to any of our readers let them read the following letter received by the assistant treasurer in New York last week:

Conrad N. Jordan, Esq., assistant treasurer, New York: I have been an adopted citizen of this country nearly fifteen years. I came from Ireland here. The country has been good to me, as it is the friend of every laboring man. It is imperiled, as I think, now, by a class of men who would ruin its credit and reduce the dollar in which my wages are paid to nearly fifty cents, if they had their way.

Since this agitation of the currency question has begun it has scared a great many people, but all I have I owe to my country; therefore, I desire to show my confidence in the Government and in the good people of this country by depositing in the sub-treasury all of my savings which I have accumulated, amounting to $820 in gold, during the fifteen years I have been here, to sustain the credit of the Government during this perilous time. While the Government issues all kinds of currency—silver notes, treasury notes—I know that the bullion in the silver is worth about fifty-three cents, and I also know that by keeping the reserve of gold in the Treasury the Government will be able to maintain all the dollars it issues at par with gold. I therefore desire to make this offering to the Treasury and thereby show my appreciation of the country which has been so free and so beneficent to me. MICHAEL MURPHY.

The Campaign: From a Business Standpoint.

Not only does the campaign bid fair to see genuine business men's campaign clubs, and a sinking of partisanship in the common endeavor to attain an end, but for the first time great organizations of co-operative capital, representing thousands of share holders scattered widely and holding hitherto most diverse political views, seem sure to step into the arena as arbiters of the question at issue.

Thus, last week, the delegates to the national league of building and loan associations, representing nearly 6,000 associations in every State in the Union, having 1,745,725 share holders with net assets of $450,667,594, unanimously adopted resolutions insisting upon the maintenance of the present standard of values, and asserting that "patriotism demands that the dollar bearing the mint mark of the United States shall be the equal of the dollar of the most advanced nations . . . and to that end it must be maintained free from all suspicion, debasement or repudiation."

Thus, last week, the presidents of two of the largest life insurance companies in the country, one in New York and the other in Connecticut, sent to all of the many thousand holders of policies in those companies terse, graphic, convincing open letters, setting forth the effect upon holders of life insurance policies, of whom there are over 10,000,000 in New York State alone, if the officials of those companies are empowered by law to pay policies in dollars worth much less than those with which premiums have been paid.

Thus, last week, a former president of the West End Railroad in Boston, employing more men than any municipal rapid transit system in the country, in an open letter to the men described the effect which a change from a gold to a silver basis would have in diminishing the purchasing power of the wages paid by the company.

Such acts are typical and significant. They show some of the methods of the campaign of education which is to be waged.

Cleveland's Centennial.

One hundred years ago, July 22, a party of surveyors headed by General Moses Cleaveland and sent out by the Connecticut Land Company, reached the mouth of the Cuyahoga River on Lake Erie, where now stands the city of Cleveland, O., with its (estimated) population of 350,000 people, its vast industrial and commercial interests, its real estate assessed in 1890 as worth $72,734,940, and its university and public schools for 40,000 pupils. Last week the citizens of Cleveland and the old Western Reserve, together with a delegation of officials and representative citizens of Connecticut, the mother State, celebrated the centennial of General Cleaveland's discovery in a manner worthy of such achievements—temporal and spiritual—as the century has disclosed. Governors Bushnell of Ohio and Coffin of Connecticut, Mr. McKinley and Senator Joseph R. Hawley delivered inspiring orations. New England Day was set apart for a dinner and after dinner speeches recalling the toothsome dishes and the political and individual ideals of the pioneer settlers of the Western Reserve. The celebration of other interesting aspects of the city's past and present life will continue through August and into September.

Orator and poet thus far have united to recall and exalt the moral foundations which underlie the life of the city and the section of which it is the capital, and all have reiterated the thought that civic and national life can only be conserved in the future by abiding in the faith of the fathers and imitating their rectitude and courage. The poet's, John James Piatt, vision of the future Cleveland is suggestive:

Streets that are highways to green fields and woods,
With charmed solitudes,
Whither the workman pent
Flies from his toil, content:
With hanging gardens of delight
For all men's sense and sight,
Where they may see the dancing fountain's flower,
Faërily silvered, wavering in the moon,
And hear the wild bird sing his vesper hymn in June,
Through the still twilight hour.
In that bright city then,
Himself one of a myriad multitude,
Shall the good citizen,
Who loves his fellowmen,
Who makes self-interest work for common good,
Dwell, and make beautiful his dwelling-place,
Striving to keep his city pure and clean,
With avenues to heaven its walls between.
He holds his vote a sacred gift and trust,
And every neighbor's sacred as his own,
Not bossed, or bought, or sold
For bribe of public place or private gold.
He knows his public duty, will not shirk
His burden of public work:
Public affairs his pleasure, study, pride
Rightly to know and not ignore but guide,
Not leaving to ignorant, faithless hands to rule
City and court and school.
He gives his hand and heart
To make a sacred shrine the voting-place,
Not a foul huckster's mart—
Where woman, if she please, may use her right
Inalienable as man's to speak, how still!

Mr. McKinley's speech on New England Day gave him an opportunity to show that he knows that "the conscience, the ideas and the principles of New England course through every vein and artery of the American republic."

Bismarck Sees War Ahead.

Sir Charles Dilke has recently ventured the prophecy that within ten years, unless the situation changes radically, Great Britain will be forced to fight Russia, France and Germany as allies. Bismarck, in an inspired interview given to the world last week, asserts the certainty of a not far distant conflict between Great Britain, and Russia and France, and he expresses the hope that Great Britain in her present strenuous search for an ally will not be rewarded by success at Berlin or Vienna. Why? Has it come to this that Germany cares more for British humiliation than for the perpetuation of the feud with France, or does the suggested compact between the great Powers of the Continent indicate that we are to hear less and less in the future of Alsace and Lorraine? What gives Russia this hypnotic power of compelling alien peoples to forget their enmities and join in pulling her chestnuts out of the fire?

A vast, awful war within a decade! Perhaps even sooner. Diplomats in Vienna and Berlin even now concede that the situation in Crete and Macedonia is fast passing into a stage where their efforts will be futile. From Van, in Armenia, come tales of fresh massacres so late as June 24, in which thousands of inhabitants of forty villages have been exterminated. From Constantinople come tales of impudent meddling with the mail of European residents; sudden disappearances of wealthy and educated Christian subjects of the sultan; a reign of terror; and the theft by the Porte of several hundred thousand pounds of interest due foreign holders of Turkish bonds. From Macedonia come reports of victories by the insurgents, and from Crete no better fate is to be credited to the disorganized, poorly paid Turkish troops. Mr. Hagop Bogigian, the eminent Armenian merchant of Boston, just home from Europe, where he has been in closest touch with diplomats, refugees and men who know the situation in Turkey, reports that discontent is ripe among the Turks, and that only a spark is needed to ignite a conflagration. All this being so, it surely seems as if the beginning of the end had come. If so, God's wrath will be upon the nation that permits its greed for land and its policy of state to stand in the way of retribution being meted out to the Turk.

NOTES.

The State Department has begun a commendable crusade against United States consuls who disgrace themselves and their country.

Lord Rosebery has shown lack of tact and want of policy—to say nothing more—in again offending conservative British Nonconformists by allying himself with the Sunday League, which purposes to open doors now closed against Sunday amusements.

The demolition of rear yard tenement houses in New York city and the ejection of tenants has begun, the courts standing by the Board of Health and asserting the full authority of the city to conserve public health and decency irrespective of private inconvenience and loss. Amen!

Dr. Stoecker, the former German court chaplain and now discredited leader and preacher, has organized a party to be known as the Religious Socialists, as distinct from the Christian Socialists led by Pastor Neumann. Its adherents must be Anti-Semites, free from Revolutionary bias and incline toward Ultra-Conservatism.

Sir William Harcourt, the Liberal leader in the House of Commons, has succeeded in a masterly campaign of opposition, of which this is the key, to quote his own words: "Through long experience I have learned that there is no use in fussing and fuming and fretting till the critical situation arises. Governments, according to my observations, much more often destroy themselves than they are destroyed by others."

The United States Circuit Court of Iowa declares the recently enacted law of that State, prohibiting the manufacture or sale of cigarettes, to be unconstitutional. This, to our mind unreasonable, decision is based on the Supreme Court's "original package argument," which declares that no State can prevent the sale of liquor (and so cigarettes, or other commodities) in the original package without interfering with interstate commerce.

"It is a strange portent that France and the United States, who, in name at least, represent purely democratic institutions, should be the two Powers who express the warmest friendship for the Russian Government." Some day the truth or falseness of this statement, by Sir Lepel Griffin, in the July Nineteenth Century will be revealed. Just now Great Britain and the United States are drawing nearer than ever before and realizing their common duty and ties, and, if the day ever comes when the people of this country are called upon to choose between British or Russian supremacy in Asia or Europe, we have not the slightest doubt as to what the American people would or should do.

The electors of the city of Holyoke have just decided to abide by a city charter which creates a city legislature of twenty-one members elected for three year terms, seven being elected each year after the first election, and representing the city at large, not wards; which gives minority representation; and which concentrates executive power and responsibility in the mayor. North Adams and Holyoke now have the best city charters in the commonwealth, and their records will doubtless be scrutinized by the commission to be appointed by Mayor Field of Northampton as well as by other students of municipal government within and far without the commonwealth.

IN BRIEF.

It is some time since The Congregationalist has issued a serial story of any considerable length. We are never willing to surrender the amount of space required unless for an exceptionally strong and wholesome piece of fiction. Such a story we believe we have secured in Charity Chance, the first installment of which will appear next week, the subsequent chapters to follow in successive issues for the next three months. The author, Mr. Walter Raymond, belongs to the younger school of English novelists, and has already earned an enviable literary reputation through Gentleman Upcott's Daughter, Love and Quiet Life, and other stories whose scenes and characters mirror the breezy, healthy, rural life of Somersetshire in the west of England. Charity Chance, the latest of Mr. Raymond's productions, is in the same vein and is fully the equal of its predecessors. We are confident our readers will follow it week by week with keen and growing interest.

"If I could get the young people as much interested in the gospel as in bicycles I think I would be a success" sighs a theologue on duty for the summer in a Maine town. And many a pastor East, West, North and South will echo the yearning.

Analysis of the last annual report of the American Unitarian Association shows that $22,765 were spent in superintending expenditures amounting to $31,740, given to eighty-five beneficiary societies, thirty-five of which made no return contribution to the association.

"What a splendid service to international comity you have rendered by your tour to the Pilgrim shrines," writes one of the editors of the Examiner, our Baptist contemporary. We are certainly glad to have a share in anything that makes manifest the oneness of men of Anglo-Saxon blood.

It cannot too earnestly and frequently be insisted upon that this is a campaign of education, not vituperation. Multitudes of people are thinking and reading as they never did before in a presidential election. The man who can state the pith of the financial question in simple, popular language has a mission and is sure of a hearing.

Mr. Balfour, the leader of the House of Commons in England, recently told a friend that the only political reading he managed to accomplish was the Diary of Toby, M. P., a comic report of parliamentary proceedings in Punch. Perhaps that is the reason why Mr. Balfour's plans of parliamentary proceeding have broken down so completely.

There is more than a grain of comfort and compensation for the hard times in the fact that the liquor business of the country is hit by existing conditions quite as severely as are legitimate and honorable forms of industry. Few will mourn the closing, last week, of the famous Hoffman House bar in New York city, which for years has been in the van of the alluring gilded resorts of the metropolis. The Raines Bill, also, is cutting a wide swath among the rumsellers of New York State.

A subscriber who prefers to hide his identity sends us twenty dollars for the Boston Fresh Air Fund. We know of no man who with the sum specified can refresh and gladden more jaded and disheartened residents in crowded city tenements than can Rev. D. W. Waldron of the City Missionary Society. We wish we had a hundred twenty-dollar bills to pass along to him at once, for his beneficent summer work is somewhat straitened by the lessening of the special contributions for it.

Congregationalists have reason to be proud of the record of Sir William Pepperell, who never allowed his great wealth or political and military honors to engender pride or loss of respect for God as the giver of all. The church at Kittery, Me., always received his loyal support, and was ever conscious of his devout spirit. Possibly he was kept unspotted from the world by reading such literature as Law's Serious Call, his annotated copy of the fourth London edition of which was picked up last week on a Cornhill bookstand at the cost of a nickel to the writer of these lines.

Rev. John Henry Barrows, D. D., who is now in Germany, expects to arrive in India by the fifteenth of December and to give three months to his missionary addresses there. His work in India has so widened that he has abandoned the plan of going with a party. It would be impossible to harmonize his work and his prolonged stay with the wishes of excursionists. Dr. and Mrs. Barrows will spend October in London, Paris and Italy. During November they expect to make, with a party, a cruise of the Mediterranean arranged by Dr. Lunn, visiting Athens, Constantinople, the Holy Land and Egypt.

One of our most watchful readers, who enjoyed the contribution in our issue of a fortnight ago, How Uncle Tom's Cabin Was Written, objects to its representation of Mrs. Stowe as fragile and feeble. From personal recollection of her, as well as from the impression left by the Life of Lyman Beecher and her own books, our correspondent has formed the opinion that she was more rugged and active than the average woman. Probably the reconciliation of these different conceptions of the great authoress lies in the fact that she grew more robust as she advanced in age.

Aside from the relation which the late ex-Governor Russell sustained to our denomination in being an adherent of Dr. McKenzie's church in Cambridge, he had been brought of late into frequent and close contact with our prominent laymen in connection with the sale of the Congregational House. In this transaction he represented the syndicate which has purchased the present edifice. Mr. Capen and his associates on the special committee speak in the highest terms of Mr. Russell's courtesy and of the pleasurable character of all their business relations with him. We are glad to notice, by the way, several Russell memorial services in different parts of the State last week. The lesson of that strong, brave life ought to be brought home to the youth of this commonwealth.

Besides the large ministerial contingent in The Congregationalist's pilgrimage to England and Holland, rather more pastors than usual seem to be taking their vacations this year on the other side of the Atlantic in trips that suit their individual fancy. Among such we have noticed: Dr. Thomas of Brookline, Dr. Berle of Brighton, Dr. McCullagh and Mr. Lewis of Worcester, Dr. Moxom of Springfield, Mr. Jubb of Fall River, Dr. Munger of New Haven, Dr. Abbott of Brooklyn, Dr. Bradford of Montclair, Dr. Noble of Chicago, Dr. Behrends of Brooklyn, Dr. Moore of Providence. With such a list of preachers from which to make selections, we doubt not that summer supply committees of English churches will, to an even larger extent than ordinarily, avail themselves of the services of their American brethren.

Lord Salisbury, the British premier, has diverted his intellect from affairs of state to consideration of the methods which laymen should adopt in supporting the church, and it is gratifying to find him on the side of simplicity and honesty of method. Present artificial methods he finds to be in striking contrast with those of the early church. He says that when Paul exhorted the Corinthians to send relief to their suffering fellow-Christians in Jerusalem, it was not found necessary to have a bazar or a public dinner, or even a public meeting with a Roman magistrate to make a speech. "A bazar, a dinner or a ball might furnish a portion of the money that was required, but it satisfied no self-discipline, it left no feeling of devotion, of gratitude, or of beneficence behind. It did the largest amount of material good with the smallest amount of spiritual benefit."

We confess that we have never seen the like of this before! We have heard of candidates sending their photographs, as well as minute histories covering all the salient events in their past and events not so salient, and we have heard of them even offering to bring their wives along with them, but we have discovered a willingness to spend and be spent beside which Barkis's would be forever cast into the shade. A circular letter has been received by the chairman of a pulpit committee, in which the writer says he has finished his former engagement and will be pleased to identify himself with a church of moderate means, where perhaps there may be plenty to do even if the financial recompense is small. He goes on to state that he has preached several years, both in the West and the East, and would come for a trial Sunday for any sum that could conveniently be paid him. The letter, it is true, is couched in respectful terms, the style is clear, the spelling correct and the chirography unexceptionable, but has it come to this, that men who think themselves called to preach the gospel must resort to circulars. We should as soon think of a man's daring to propose to the object of his affection through the medium of a typewritten letter, or of the prophet Isaiah dictating his glowing messages to a stenographer.

Harvard Church, Brookline, is furnishing an exceptionally strong succession of summer supplies, and public appreciation of the fact is evinced by the number of persons in the congregations Sunday after Sunday whose church affiliations are elsewhere, or in some cases, we regret to say, nowhere. President Tucker preached on two of the earlier Sundays of the month, and last Sunday Dr. Meredith was in the pulpit, a number of his old-time and faithful Boston admirers embracing the opportunity to hear him. His morning sermon related to Philemon, and in the course of it he outlined the effects of the gospel upon hardened and unpromising specimens of humanity. He then passed on to remark that if there was more of the gospel spirit in the world today we should hear less talk of repudiation. This called out very audible applause, which is something of a novelty in stately Harvard Church, though we remember that a traveling missionary by the name of Puddefoot produced the same effect there by an address a few months ago. In the evening Dr. Meredith preached on the fatherhood of God, especially in its bearing upon prayer. This we judge is coming to be one of the central and foremost thoughts in the Doctor's preaching, and he presses it home with all the vehemence of which he is capable. For a man whose sermon delivery is marked by such vigor of action Dr. Meredith reads the Scripture and prays in an uncommonly quiet, reverent and impressive fashion.

The Defeats of the Soul.*

By John Watson, A. M., D. D. (Ian Maclaren).

Each person has two lives, one of which is known to the world, one of which is hidden. The former life could be written by a friend, for the material lies ready to his hand and can be gathered in the light of day. It would have chapters on childhood, youth, manhood, middle age; chapters on school, university, office, home; chapters on politics, creed, philanthropy, public service; chapters on successes, failures, trials, honors. Perhaps it might even have a chapter on character, whereat one would smile sadly for the virtues he never really had. This biography may be written by any pen, for there is no copyright in these things; and it may be scattered abroad, for there is no secrecy. When people read this life they are apt to imagine that everything has been told, and that the man has been revealed. We are so easily satisfied with an appearance; we are so slow to suspect the heart within. This catalogue of dates, places, events, words, traditions, functions, the story of a life! It is only the green grass and flowers which conceal a treasure or a grave—a common photograph of the face which any passer-by can see upon the street.

The other life is unknown to one's mother and is barely suspected by the shrewdest friend, but it is real, influential, eternal. It also has chapters that do not turn on numbers or geography, that have yielded nothing to newspapers or gossip. That Sunday—year forgotten; the old church—mother remembered and the softness of her sealskin jacket; preacher in pulpit—name first unknown; text from somewhere—could not find it for father in the evening; could not even give heads afterward—was supposed to have behaved badly in church; and to this day we can recall the sensation. When men write diaries for publication after death they call this experience conversion, but the boy had no name for it, said nothing about it, dares hardly believe even to this day that God spoke unto him. One night the lad could not sleep, although in perfect health and very tired after a day out of doors. He had been taken unawares that afternoon, and now repented bitterly of the lie. The shining of the moonlight, the whiteness of his bed, the stillness of the room—all affright, shame, condemn him. He has been caught, broken, degraded within himself, and is a thing of contempt. He is an old man now and has had many sore tussles with sin, but that wound still smarts at a time and the scar will always be seen. One morning a man flung aside his books and went out upon the hill. For hours he tramped across the heather till he came to a lonely spot where a river rises from its spring, and then he sat himself down to settle the matter. What matter? It would hardly be believed by his friends, who know the common sense, hard headed, middle-aged man, but it was the question whether there be a God, what he is and who we are. When he came back in the light of the setting sun his face was full of peace. Unwritten chapters, the origin, maybe, of a long biography that shall have in it much of joy and sadness, many defeats and many victories.

It is difficult to know whom one ought to pity or envy, for one knows so little about the inner life. You have often been concerned about a neighbor because he had lost a child or was in narrow circumstances, or suffered from weak health, or was out of society. Perhaps you would have saved your sympathy for some more needy case had you dwelt for an hour in that man's soul, which was closed against the vexations of the world, which was enriched with the gifts of God, where the divine peace ever rested, and the angels of God were frequent guests. You have in thought congratulated another friend because all things seem to work together for his good, and the sun is ever shining on his life. You had changed your mind after one glimpse into his soul, with its fierce passions, its unredeemed materialism, its dominant selfishness, its black unbelief. For each man lives two lives—the one in the outer court, where the world comes and goes; and the one within the veil—where he is alone, and the real joy of living is the light of God within and the sense of victory.

Various experiences of the secret life fill one with shame, but the persistence of a besetting sin drives one near to despair. Far back in childhood this evil visitor first appeared in our soul and filled us with horror. We shrank from his touch and ordered him out at the door. For a while his face was not seen and we had forgotten the incident. One day he is found hanging round the outskirts of our life like a restless predatory vagrant, and after a few months, when we are accustomed to his appearance, he crosses the threshold and pleads for house room. Times there are when we drive him forth in anger; times there are when we endure his presence. He comes to have his place and his employment in our soul—a vagabond of whom we are ashamed but whom we tolerate, whom we condemn but whom we would miss. Now and again our conscience awakes and arises to put the house in order, and then there is a fiery scene and our unholy lodger is banished, with warning never to return. Within a few days the unabashed figure finds the door on the latch and makes for his accustomed corner with a leer, and we are so disheartened that it seems no use to dispute his coming.

The unspeakable disgrace of this lifelong partnership is one of the horrors of the soul and the cause of its bitterest self-reproach. Our friends remarked, say, our fierce temper in childhood, but were certain it would be mastered when we had more understanding. Youth brought no self-restraint, and our hot head involved us in acts of reckless insubordination. Manhood, with its cares and responsibilities, did not lay this evil spirit to rest. The calm dignity of old age was humiliated by the same fits of passion that had devastated our youth. We have passed from stage to stage of life, but have not shaken off this sin; we have changed our house again and again but have not left this fellow-tenant. We have worn out several bodies but not this body of death. It guarantees our identity, it maintains our continuity, it links us with the past. People who had not seen us for half a lifetime recognize us without hesitation. Our eyes are the same color, our voice is on the same key, and our temper is as fresh and strong and masterful as ever.

It does sometimes happen that we are rid of a sin, not because we have conquered it but because it has grown effete. There are sins of foolishness that die for want of nourishment with the thinner blood of age, but their vacant place is apt to be taken by others which are quite as pestilent and which have come to stay. An exchange of sins can hardly be called a victory of the soul, for one has gained little who was once a voluptuary and now is a miser. The Protean variety of sin gets upon the nerves, and one has the sense of being shadowed by an enemy who is ever appearing in some new disguise and is ever on one's track. It seems an almost hopeless campaign, because it has no truces; it has an endless series of battlegrounds; it is not likely to have any end, till death. And then, what if death does not cut this miserable union, and our sin and our soul begin life together on the other side, and the humiliation of these few years be perpetuated through the ages?

It may seem impossible to get any consolation out of this conflict, but at least the shame of it is certain to cleanse us from all self-righteousness and to inspire us with humility. He is coated with triple brass who should be assailed by fiery temptations and yet has no sympathy with a neighbor's conflict, who should be overcome by the power of an ancient sin and yet have no charity for the fall of a brother. When one is fighting for his life every day with temptation he can hardly be a Pharisee. If people, through thinness of nature or an overmastering prudence, are never inclined to transgress, they are apt to be censorious and unmerciful, but he who has many scars carries a tender heart.

Frequent disasters of the soul deliver us from shallow views of religion and convince us that we need more for our security than an example. No power can be of much avail that does not act from within and reenforce us in the crises of temptation. What one longs for is a second alliance—this time with a Saviour. If there be any one in heaven or earth who has gone through the same agony and has come out victor, who has a fellow-feeling with other men and is ready to join forces with them, then we need not abandon hope, although the past has been one uninterrupted defeat. It is at this point of despair many people have turned to Jesus and made trial of him for the first time. Before, they may have believed or disbelieved about him, they knew nothing of him, because he was outside, a historical, theological personage. When one, as a last resource, has received Jesus within and begins to wage war in his fellowship, then it comes to pass that the gospels are repeated in his inner life, and a plain man has materials both for a book of Psalms and a biography of Jesus.

The British Weekly is privileged to publish, for the first time, some correspondence between Elizabeth Barrett Browning and a religious pamphleteer, in which the great poet gives some of her religious convictions, and it is gratifying to note that she was loyal to the same branch of the church from which her husband came—the Congregational.

Pilgrimage Letters.

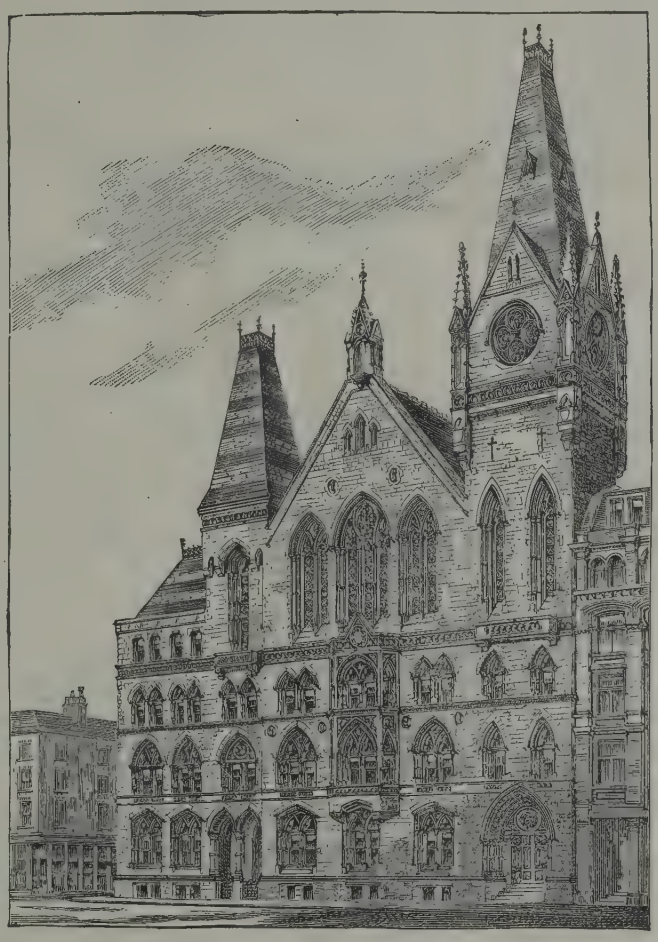
The Rich and Varied Delights of London. At Canterbury with Dean Farrar.

Never were plain pilgrims more sumptuously housed than were the members of The Congregationalist's party at Hotel Cecil on Victoria Embankment. The view from the balcony on the river side at night was simply entrancing. Just across the green stretch of gardens rolled the Thames, twinkling with lights from the lazy, lumbering barges and the fussy, flying steamers. To the right loomed up the majestic towers of Westminster and the Parliament Houses. From them, away round the crescent to St. Paul's on the left, was one unbroken sweep of bridges, moving vehicles, glimmering lanterns of all colors and forests of shipping, making, in the weird moonlight, a scene of unparalleled beauty. The hotel was opened only last May, has more than a thousand rooms and is superb in all its appointments. During our stay the proprietors kept the stars and stripes flying from the cupola. The site is historic, the original house being built by Robert Cecil, first Earl of Salisbury, Queen Elizabeth's famous secretary. From here she passed along the Strand to St. Paul's to return thanks for the vanquishment of the Armada by her hardy sailors.

Sharp, indeed, was the contrast between this palatial pile and the places we visited the day after our arrival, under the guidance of Rev. Andrew Mearns, secretary of the London Congregational Union, and Rev. William Mottram, who has made a study of sites connected with Nonconformist history. The party filled two large "breaks," with four prancing horses attached to each, and attracted no small degree of attention as we drove along, halting at places where our fathers in the faith languished in filthy prisons or gave up their lives at the stake. Two of the jails Dickens has immortalized in David Copperfield and Little Dorrit. Not a vestige of one remains and the other is now a tinplate factory. We passed the old Tabard Inn of Chaucer's day, now a corner gin palace, and explored the gigantic modern brewery where once the bishops of Winchester had their palace. To it was attached the Clink Prison, whence the noble army of martyrs went forth to the flames in Smithfield. An overwhelming sense of the preciousness of our Congregational history possessed us as we saw where Penry was hung, when we stood within the Pilgrim Fathers' Church in Southwark, founded in martyrs' blood in 1592, and when, at the close of the day, we came to the beautiful Memorial Hall, occupying the site of Fleet Prison, in whose foul cells many Protestants and Nonconformists were confined in the days of the Tudors and Stuarts.

And what a meeting we had there! Dr. Guinness Rogers presided and alluded to the defeat in Parliament, that very day, of the Education Bill. Hugh Price Hughes, speaking of it "as the most tremendous blow ever given the enemies of the Pilgrim Fathers," awakened the enthusiasm of his listeners. But when he pointed to the Union Jack and the stars and stripes everywhere intertwined about the room and exclaimed, "That flag and that must never meet on a field of blood," the burst of prolonged applause was thrilling in its intensity, the audience springing up and shouting with uncontrolled enthusiasm. Mr. Whittemore made the introductions in inimitable fashion, each pilgrim rising in response to his or her name. Occasional slips of the tongue, like calling for Myles Standish in place of Mr. Littlefield, his lineal descendant, caused much merriment. Ian Maclaren expected to be present, but was detained in Wales, so sent a telegram. Fine music, an hour of social intercourse and light refreshments constituted other features of this delightful reception.

If we did less justice than usual to the delicious bread, butter, strawberries and beverages, it was because we had just come from a tea in the chapter house of St. Paul as guests of the archdeacon, Dr. Sinclair, who had previously conducted us through the cathedral. He is a man of magnificent proportions, and reminds one of Phillips Brooks in his tolerant spirit. This was apparent when he said to Dr. Newman Hall, as we sipped our tea in the old oak-paneled room, "If the laws and customs of our church allowed I should be only too happy to invite my friend here to preach in St. Paul's." No other ecclesiastical building in London is so well frequented, the audiences each week day ranging from 400 to 700, and on Sunday evenings they reach 5,000. We were impressed when we attended service earlier in the afternoon with both the size and the character of the congregation, a large proportion from the humbler classes in society being present. After meeting Dr. Sinclair the secret of his influence was understood. Here, and again at Westminster Abbey, we appreciated anew what exceptional advantages over the ordinary tourist we have had on this trip.



MEMORIAL HALL, LONDON.
Headquarters of English Congregationalists.

At Westminster Abbey Dean Bradley entertained us in the Jerusalem Chamber. Storied windows, sculptured marbles, royal tombs and historic monuments have been interpreted to us in a fashion unknown to Baedeker, by the living voices of men who know how to invest the past with the reality of the present. The long procession of sovereigns, from William the Conqueror to Victoria, who have gone out from this room to their coronation seemed to pass in review before us as we sat in the mellow afternoon sunshine around the table where the Revision Committee met in 1870 and where the Assembly of Divines, after five and a half years, formulated their famous catechism. We saw, in imagination, the death of Henry IV. before the ancient fireplace, so dramatically portrayed by Shakespeare, and as we emerged from the chamber and followed our genial and fascinating host through chapel, chapter house and cloister of this British Walhalla, the very dead seemed to become alive through the magic of his words. His delightfully sympathetic allusions to Pilgrim and American history were not the least acceptable part of his informal lecture and eloquent comments.

Among other courtesies extended to us was a garden party at The Firs, the home of Mr. and Mrs. Halley Stewart, members of Dr. Guinness Rogers's church in Clapham. By a happy coincidence the church was celebrating its 250th anniversary and we had an opportunity to meet many eminent Nonconformists. Tables with refreshments were spread under the trees on the spacious lawn and a party of boys from the Spurgeon Orphanage furnished charming music with hand bells. Mr. Stewart is an ex-member of Parliament and holds quite progressive views on all social questions. Both he and his accomplished wife are fine exponents of the creed that wealth should be used for the blessing of others, by using their beautiful house and grounds in behalf of the sick, the poor and unfortunate.

Still another most enjoyable occasion was a restful afternoon tea at Christ Church, by invitation of Rev. F. B. Meyer and Dr. Newman Hall. It was a thoughtful courtesy, after a most fatiguing day, to omit speech making and allow us the simple "fellowship of kindred minds." So we broke bread together and mingled our prayers and songs in the daintily decorated chapel where Mr. Meyer, on different days in the week, meets various groups of people, the Boys' Brigade at one time, the mothers at another, and so on through all the network of activities of this flourishing church, to which, on Sunday evening, working men flock by the hundreds. "There is where I get my inspiration when I enter the pulpit," said the pastor, as we stood in the little entrance room, fragrant with memories of Rowland Hill. And he pointed to a photograph of Dr. A. J. Gordon on one side and to a frame on the other inclosing a leaf from the note-book of McCheyne. Between these two he would pass to his own wonderful ministry from the pulpit occupied nearly forty years by Newman Hall.

One more rare pleasure awaited us during our stay in London, and that was a pilgrimage to the ancient shrine of Canterbury, where we had an embarrassment of riches. Rev. W. E. Stephenson and others met us at the station and conducted us to the Congregational church, which was packed with one of the most cordial audiences we have met anywhere. After brief religious exercises an elaborate address of welcome, beautifully engrossed, was read and then presented to Dr. Dunning. This was signed by the ministers of all the Free churches in Canterbury, including the officers of the old Huguenot church, whose services have been held in the crypt of the cathedral for 300 years. Next we were whisked off to St. Martin's, a quaint little edifice on a high hill, with a history dating back to Roman times, as proved by excavations made within a few months. Here Augustine came to convert heathen England, and here Queen Bertha had a chapel fitted up for Christian worship, this being the condition of her coming to England. Her pagan husband, King Ethelred, was won to her faith and baptized in the old stone font still to be seen. The fascinating story and all the subsequent history as told by the rector, Rev. White-Thomson, was a literary treat never to be forgotten. As we came away we noticed Dean Alford's grave with the touching inscription: "The inn of a traveler on his way to Jerusalem."

Finally came our visit to the venerable cathedral, which will celebrate its 1300th anniversary next summer. Dean Farrar, with Mrs. Farrar and others of the household, received us in the deanery gardens, accompanied us on our memorable tour of inspection and afterward entertained some of our party at tea. The distinguished antiquary, Canon Scott Robinson, was also with us. No adequate account is possible of this most enriching experience. It was like walking in a dream to traverse the very path of Chaucer's pilgrims, to enter Bertha's gate, to stand on the spot where Becket was murdered—the stone pavement worn into hollows by the knees of worshipers at his shrine, to pause at the magnificent tomb of Edward the Black Prince, or of Langton, the great promoter of the struggle which ended in obtaining the Magna Charta. Whittier's line,

> We, too, are heirs of Runnymede, came instinctively to mind as we inspected this huge and complicated pile of masonry, exhaustless in its historical interest and glorified with the matchless word painting of Dean Farrar. Bewildered by all we had seen and enjoyed it was unspeakably soothing to pause for the refreshment of the afternoon service in the cathedral and to unite with our English friends in singing,

> We are not divided,
> All one body we,
> One in hope and doctrine,
> One in charity.

THE JOYS OF BICYCLING.

BY A MINISTER'S WIFE.

I have always thought that there ought to be a society for the protection of ministers' lone wives. The spring months especially are full of delightful conventions, to which only the male member of the clerical body is invited, the female half being thought quite learned enough in her character of stay-at-home. I felt this even more keenly when the dominie said, "I must have a bicycle." To which I promptly and emphatically added, "I must have one, too." The emphasis settled the matter, and two bicycles were ordered instead of one.

When the two innocent-looking steeds ambled gently to the front door, their jet coats all burnished, their harness a silver glitter, the happy owners looked them over with hearts swelling with pride, little dreaming what snorting, fiery monsters they would become, or how many times they would take the bit in their teeth and rush on to seeming destruction ere they responded to the conquering touch of a master-hand.

The whole parish took an intense interest in the new purchases and all sorts of advice was proffered us. One said we must learn going up hill, another said we must learn going down hill, while a third preferred a dead level. The parson confidingly put his trust in a sturdy youth who advocated the down hill process, and who promised to spend an afternoon initiating him into the mysteries. The theory of the teacher was to get on and stick on, and the hill and the wheel would take care of the rest. Under the study windows the lawn sloped down to the garden, and that was chosen as the right spot. The horror of the parson's wife can better be pictured than described as from the study window she saw her reverend husband wildly careering down that hill, his best hat on, only to land in a heap in the garden, while the hat rolled off into a hole strictly intended for the kitchen garbage.

Every one who had mastered the wheel spoke confidently of a moment which was to arrive when the "know how" was to come to us suddenly, out of the clouds as it were, like a falling star or an inspiration. In the midst of our manifold gyrations, seemingly aimless in character, we greeted the idea with scorn, but spite of our disbelief—not, however, without a large expenditure for witch-hazel—it did come, that never-to-be-forgotten moment when we knew how to ride the wheel.

Monday is the minister's resting time, and when the weather permits we spend the day in delightful excursions into the surrounding country. A ten-mile ride on a perfect June day is printed indelibly on the memory of our early apprenticeship. Here is no city or town macadam, but the bicycle track between the two villages is a narrow and anything but straight path—though exceedingly "strait" in the strict Biblical sense, for the ubiquitous roadmender had been industriously scraping up the roadside to dump it into the middle of the highway, according to the rigid Connecticut idea of true roadmaking. The rain had fallen the day before, so that the well-beaten trail ran close to an occasional puddle, whose murky glare was especially fascinating to those particularly desirous of avoiding it, and the path ran so close to the outer edge that the roadside bushes and low tree branches often brushed the face of the riders.

With bicycle faces rigidly set, their vertebræ rattling like "cherries in a bowl" (quoted from Power Through Repose), the two novices bestrode their fiery steeds down the narrow pathway, now miraculously escaping a puddle, anon striking a rolling stone and biting the dust of the roadway, while their horses apparently took a nibble at the roadside grass. In the exhilaration of such a ride what did they care for the anxieties connected with any parish? The latter part of the way was down hill, the wind was at their backs fairly pushing them forward.

On sped the silent steeds, sometimes along cool stretches of shadow under arching trees, where the whiff of aromatic pine or moist smell of wood earth greeted the nostrils. A moment later out into the sunshine, with the daisies and clover and buttercups running riot on the roadside, with the blue sky above and beyond, peeps of distant hills or a nearer view of slopes pink with azalea and emerald with all the sweet, green growing things that make June such a bewitching month. On, still on, everything forgot in a wild intoxication of motion, until the village is reached with a rousing appetite for the savory dinner provided by the genial host of the village inn.

Considering the bicycle as a health tonic, probably the best time for its use is in the early morning. You resolve to rise with the sun, but old Sol peeps over yonder hill rubbing his sleepy eyes as you mount your wheel, not yet wide awake enough to arouse the slumbering people with his inquisitive prying. So the town lies asleep as you wend your way through the quiet streets. The dust, soon to be hurled in a million particles by the heavy tread of weary horses, lies lightly pressed by the fallen dew. The smoke and the steam, which will soon belch forth from the many factories, are gathering energy for their work, and only the clatter of the milk cart and the crow of the early cock jar the stillness.

Beyond the town we take the meadow road. The sun reflects its shining beam in every dewdrop, and turns into a golden thread the little creek running sluggishly through the meadow. The whole world has a fresh washed look and a pure, sweet smell as of newly laundered linen. The daisy petals have fallen, but in their stead the scarlet tiger lilies are opening their mottled hearts to the sun's caress, and jaunty, black-eyed Susans nod a merry "good morning," while in the damper spots the lingering blue flag haughtily lifts its aristocratic blossom, and a thousand roadside weeds are marshaling their forces for a gorgeous display a little later. The meadow lark dips into the tall grass for a sip of dew, then mounting upward pours forth a volume of song. The bobolinks are awing, and the blackbird, with flame tipped wings, adds a flash of brilliant color to the landscape. In the orchard yonder a tantalizing glimpse of the orange-coated oriole tells that he has started the serious occupation of providing food for his family, so serious that the end of the season finds him a bedraggled bird too weary for song.

Darting along the stone wall beside you a saucy chipmunk contemptuously flirts his bushy tail as he easily beats you in a free race, sending back a mocking chirrup, ere he vanishes from sight, which plainly says, "What poor fools mortals be to try to rival nature's handiwork!" From some hidden source an enchanting fragrance is wafted to your nostrils; ah! it comes from a belated rose nestling against the cool, stone wall, and adds its mite to a paradise already surfeited with pleasures. As you wheel along, feasting your eyes on the changing green of the distant hills, now softened by the white banners which the chestnuts—a mass of bloom—are flinging to the breeze; with the blood dancing in your veins and every nerve center responding to the joy of perpetual motion, never did the whole world seem more beautiful.

CURRENT THOUGHT.

AT HOME.

The Christian Mirror has a word of advice for The Advance. It says: "We sincerely hope that its next issue will in point of time be far enough away from 'the cross and crown' oration for our Western champion of orthodoxy to detect and disclose the absurdities and the abominations of a platform which has been unsurpassed in the history of our country as a menace to our national existence. The fulminations of the anarchist and socialist should find no mightier foe than Advance Congregationalists."

It is significant that the Epworth Herald should say: "'God gave me my money,' says Mr. Rockefeller, 'and I give it to the Chicago University.' All of which is very satisfactory to Chicago and the university authorities. But we cannot help feeling that Mr. Rockefeller may be mistaken concerning the source of his money."

The Churchman comments on some aspects of the annual Christian Endeavor convention which it believes deserve consideration. It questions whether a convention which compels an expenditure "that would clear the debts of all the missionary societies of the land or save a nation of perishing Armenians" is justified by its results. It deplores the tendency to "intense self-glorification."

The Scientific American, in its fiftieth anniversary edition, calls attention to the fact that "the resident of a low-priced flat has more of the conveniences of life at his disposal than fell to the lot of the owner of the finest city mansion a few years ago. . . . Food for the family is now procurable in endless variety independent of the season of the year. . . . The most impressive achievements of engineering are executed in order that at the turning of a kitchen faucet water may flow into the kettle of the cook. . . . The electric trolley road is, however, the most powerful . . . factor in what we have alluded to as remedial of the ills of modern centralization. . . . The trolley may yet modify cities until they become centers of work and not of residence."

ABROAD.

The Methodist Times sees the advantage of adapting the Wesleyan ecclesiastical machinery to the bicycle riding habit. It says: "In consequence of the itinerancy, we have frequently been described as 'a church on wheels.' This is now likely to be true in a quite unexpected sense. We have already learned from various rural correspondents that the bicycle is an untold gain to the country minister who has many villages to visit. It completely alters the conditions of pastoral life in country circuits, and enables our brethren to do easily and joyfully what has often in the past been an almost impossible, as well as most laborious, physical task. We strongly urge ministers, local preachers and mission workers to avail themselves to the utmost of the new opportunity which the bicycle gives them to evangelize villages and distant places hitherto reached with so much difficulty and at so great an expense."

Professor Harnack, in Die Hilfe, reviews Dr. von Nathusius's recent pamphlet on What Is Christian Socialism? and says: "The Christian Church, while it holds fast to the Bible, has in its midst two great reforming forces from which all revivals in the course of church history have proceeded—(1) The preaching of St. Paul on sin, on grace and on faith. (2) The words of our Lord. In the history of the church these powers have alternately been brought to the front by divinely aroused persons, as if their influence were felt for the first time, and they have produced effectual reforms. The words of Christ were the powerful influence of the reforming movement of monasticism in all the forms of its rich development. No ecclesiastical schism ever arose through them. But in the line of Paulinism, from St. Augustine onwards, one great new creation of churches took place in the churches of the Reformation. These churches ought not to lose what through God's grace they have won. But have they, I mean in their ideal form, really placed the words of Christ on the same high candlestick on which they have placed the preaching of St. Paul?"

The London Chronicle, reviewing a recently issued collection of English essays by G. Cuthbert Blaxland, in which Mr. Blaxland discusses phases of the Pilgrim immigration to Plymouth, says of Bradford: "Like Cæsar's narrative of the Gallic wars, Bradford's story derives additional interest from the fact that its author took a foremost part in the events he describes. Bradford himself was a type and example of the best class of American statesmen who were to follow him when the little germ in the New England forests had expanded into a mighty republic. He is the spiritual ancestor of Lincoln, with the same homely wisdom, the same indomitable fortitude, the same all-conquering faith which removes mountains, the very best product of the old English stock." And Mr. Blaxland, referring to the same man and his narrative, says: "His record of events from year to year, as God in his providence had ordered them, clothed in a language which, though often homely, is never petty or undignified, but rather full of unstudied grace, and infused with the poetry of deep feeling and unaffected religion, becomes a true epic. It is an epic of the ways of God with man."

The London Chronicle thinks that the correspondence between Lord Salisbury and Mr. Olney, made public July 18, "looked at by the future historian may be seen to have been the foundation stone of the edifice which shall replace war among civilized nations. This, when it is built, and the glorious coping-stone placed in position, will be the greatest achievement of civilization. . . . Lord Salisbury and Mr. Olney obviously feel most keenly the responsibility resting upon them as the respective guardians of the vital interests of the two greatest nations in the world. Each comes to the discussion with every faculty roused to the highest tension, and the intellectual sword-play is indeed fascinating reading."

Often he who has most courage and most strength to stand alone has the deepest craving for appreciation.—Philip S. Moxom.

PRAYER MEETING.

BY REV. H. A. BRIDGMAN.

Topic, Aug. 9–15. The Conquest of Temptation (a temperance topic). Eph. 6: 10–18.

The only lasting conquest comes from realizing that it is never safe to stop fighting. There is a deep lesson in that sentence in Luke's account of Jesus' temptation to the effect that the devil left him for a season. No doubt the victory in the wilderness made all subsequent struggles with Satan easier, but, if our Lord were truly human, he must have been often approached by the tempter throughout all his years on earth. Sometimes, it is true, God honors a man's heroic endeavor to free himself from a certain besetting sin by permitting him to rise above the fear of ever again becoming a victim to it. At the same time the testimony of men who have fought and mastered the drink devil is that, even years afterward, the old passion would suddenly recur with almost overwhelming force. The selfish principle in us has so many roots and branches that when one is killed another shoot is likely to appear. The proper attitude is one of humility and vigilance, not of boasting and fancied superiority to temptation. Nearly every Christian who has dealt with his besetting sins at close range can bear witness that the evil thing in us which we thought we had entirely vanquished returns in the most unexpected ways and places.

This way of stating the matter may seem to represent life as perpetual warfare, and therefore may dishearten struggling Christians. There is, thank God, another aspect. Life is a battle, it is true, but life may also be a song. My practical suggestion in this direction is that we do not concentrate all our efforts simply upon overcoming our temptations. That keeps us on the defensive all the time. We get to thinking that on a given day we have nothing to do in the Christian life except to fight our besetting sins. The apostolic method is better. Let us undertake to overcome evil with good. Let us strive to be so faithful to duty, so kind and considerate in speech and action, so intent upon the higher interests of our natures that the tempter will find it hard to get a foothold in our thoughts and in our imaginations. This positive, constructive policy is well set forth in the martial figures with which the passage referred to above abounds. The word and the Spirit of God incorporated into the very fiber of our being constitutes a splendid armor.

It is discouraging work at best, unless we lay hold of the divine help. Right here our faith can prove most precious and helpful to us. When a man faces Satan he feels most keenly his need of Christ. Perhaps that explains why we are subject all through our earthly lives to these subtle approaches of evil. It is possible for a man to get along without God in the midst of trials and disappointments. He can assume a stoical bearing, can set his teeth firmly and manage somehow to weather the gale without the help of religion, though it is foolish and wicked for him to dispense with its consolations and relief. But we cannot imagine a successful endurance of temptation apart from an alliance with God. It was when Paul felt the power of the sin principle within him that he realized most keenly the need of divine succor and cried out, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me out of the body of this death?" We can even be thankful for our temptations if they make us want and appreciate the saving power of Christ.

The Life and Character of John Robinson.

A Generous and Discriminating Tribute to the Great Pilgrim Leader.

This is the full text of the address delivered by Hon. T. F. Bayard, the American ambassador to the Court of St. James, in connection with laying the foundation stone of the John Robinson Memorial Church at Gainsborough June 29.

We have gathered here—many of us from lands far distant and beyond the great seas, and many more from English homes closer to the scene—to lay the corner stone of a memorial church, which is intended to be a monument dedicated to the glory and worship of Almighty God and the loving memory of his faithful servant, John Robinson of Gainsborough-upon-Trent, in northwestern Lincolnshire, who, not far from the spot where we stand, was born 320 years ago, and whose body was returned to dust at Leyden, in the Netherlands, in the year of our Lord 1625—as is there recorded upon the mortuary tablet in the Church of St. Peter and St. Paul in that city. Nothing, as it seems to me, could be less worthy and more unfit than to make this an occasion for the vainglory of rhetoric, and by interposing the commonplaces of oratory and verbal decoration to deprive the noble simplicity of the life and character of John Robinson of its own native force and impressiveness. If we can only realize or imagine how the man himself would have felt, if living here today among us, we will be in a frame of mind which will better enable us to comprehend him and the lesson of his life, and appreciate the fruits of his works, which "do follow him." In such a spirit and with such intent I shall endeavor to say the few words which I have been asked to say by reverend ministers of the Congregational order in my own country—a request seconded by the reverend ministers who represent the union of Congregational churches in Great Britain.

THE PURITAN REVIVAL.

The "emancipation of England from Norman domination" I believe to be a just and true title and description of the spiritual movement of which, on the threshold of the seventeenth century, the scanty handful of simple agriculturists at the neighboring "townlet" of Scrooby, on the River Idle, near its junction with the Trent, was the nucleus, of which John Robinson became the pastor, and whose place of worship was the hall of the Manor House of William Brewster, who was born at Scrooby—the only member of wealth in the congregation and a graduate of the University of Cambridge. Of the birth and parentage of John Robinson, whose exile began when he was thirty-one years old and was lifelong, there remains but vague history, for, owing to his enforced separation from this country—and the prelatical persecutions that at that time desolated the homes and families of all independent religious dissidents—but little has survived of documentary proof of the local and personal history of the period, so that I have not been enabled to discover even the names or residences of his progenitors, or trace collateral relationships. Of his own career in England—as afterwards in Holland—happily there is no room for doubt; and his own hand has left the written record of his thoughts and labors in the cause of "soul liberty" and emancipation, which have borne such fruits in both hemispheres of the globe. That he himself styled Lincolnshire "his county," and there proceeded, at the call of conscience, after he had withdrawn from his ministry in the national church at Norwich, may be held to fix that county as his place of birth. At the age of seventeen his name is found enrolled in the University of Cambridge, and on the register of Emmanuel College is entered as a sizar, 2nd March, 1592; took his degree M. A. in 1600, and B. D. 1607. I am aware that the register of Corpus Christi College also contains the entry of his name—John Robinson, E. Lincolnshire, admitted 1592, and Fellow 1593—and perhaps the date of his degree of B. D. in 1607 in the register of Emmanuel may leave an open question as to this last entry.

THE CHARACTER OF ROBINSON.

But he completed his terms at Cambridge, where his scholarship gained for him a fellowship and the highest honors that university could bestow—and he truly was, in the words of a contemporary, "learned, polished, modest, and not easily to be paralleled." We find that his four years of ministry at Norwich were filled with unrest and mental disquietude, and that in 1604 he withdrew to Lincolnshire, and there united himself with a congregation at Scrooby who had constituted themselves into a church by a solemn covenant with God and with each other—"to walk in his ways made known, or to be made known, unto them according to their best endeavors, whatever it should cost them." From Ashton's Memoir of John Robinson, and annotations, I here transcribe:

Scrooby must henceforth be regarded as the cradle of Massachusetts. Here the choice and noble spirits, at the head of whom were Brewster and Bradford, first learned the lessons of truth and freedom. Here, under the faithful ministration of the pastors, they were nourished and strengthened to that vigorous and manly fortitude which braved all dangers; and here, too, they acquired that moral and spiritual courage which enabled them to sacrifice their homes, property and friends and expatriate themselves to distant lands rather than abandon their principles and yield to the attempted usurpation in the liberty of their consciences.

And let us not, I pray you, allow our sense of sympathy for such men to degenerate to the lower level of mere pity—for indeed they had that within them which placed them in life, as it does their memories today, quite above and beyond the need of such an emotion. John Robinson and his co-religionists trod the winepress of affliction, but they trod it with a lofty spirit, with the moral dignity of sublimated intent. They were filled with that joy which is born of a cherished conviction in its hour of oppression and which seems for its perfection to need the sharp frosts of adversity, such as approaching winter brings to the American forest, giving tints of an autumnal beauty more exquisite than the luxuriance a summer sun can ever bestow. Such men never crept, but ever marched through life—"Anthropoi"—with heaven-erected faces, and heard ever singing in their hearts the clear, uplifting voice of judicial conscience, like a trumpet call to the clear spirits, for they felt themselves soldiers in the cause of truth and heard her accents in every vicissitude. My dear countryman, James Russell Lowell, in a preface to a Life of Isaac Walton—a contemporary (although a little younger) of John Robinson—describes as the "sixth beatitude" that "the pure in heart shall see God, not only in some future and far-off scene, but wherever they turn their eyes." And by this we may be able to comprehend what it was upon which the minds and hearts of these pilgrims and their pastor were fed, and upon what they turned their eyes and found cause for hope and cheerful courage in the dark hours of their persecution, adversity and affliction. The religion of assent has its equal counterpart in the religion of dissent—the obligation to do those things that we ought to do, and the equal obligation to leave undone those things we ought not to do.

OUR DEBT TO BYGONE GENERATIONS.

Is it not well to pause now and then on our journey and consider the indubitable progress of civilization—the actual moral outgrowth of the principles of Christianity and the consequent advance the world has made under it—and how today we accept and enjoy, as a matter of course, the blessings and advantages of civil and religious liberty, giving but little thought to the generations who in bygone years toiled and suffered to secure them for us? How small the measure of our gratitude and infrequent our recognition of those who

Beyond their dark age led the van of thought.

On such a scene, and on such an occasion as this, well may the words of Whittier be repeated:

. . . We lightly hold
A right, which brave men died to gain,
The stake, the cord,
The ax, the sword,
Grim nurses at its birth of pain.

Consider the absolute and unquestioned religious liberty of the times in which we live, and in those countries governed by the English-speaking races. And then go back 300 years and endeavor to realize here in England the condition of John Robinson and his little flock of co-religionists at Scrooby, asking only to be allowed to worship God and lift their hearts to him in such words and forms of supplication for his guidance and mercy as their needs of conscience and the instinctive hunger of the heart instructed them to pray for.

INDIVIDUAL FREEDOM THE ROOT OF SOCIAL AND RELIGIOUS PROGRESS.

Conscience and reason were the underlying moral forces, then as now, at work, and from them was slowly evolving all social and political progress, at the root of which lay the recognition of individual freedom and "the equal right of every man to be unhindered by men in the fulfillment of his duty to God." Yet in those days, under the reign of James I.—a pedantic bigot, well styled "a captain of arts and a doctor of arms"—it was forbidden so to pray in England, and equally restrained were they from going out of England to pray in foreign lands. It was sought to enforce the royal claim to settle the world's theology by the will of a monarch—to make the religion of the magistrate the religion of the people—and all individual freedom of conscience and mind was to be despotically coerced into unintelligent or hypocritical submission. The Christian religion was not based upon worldly power or property in any of its forms, but upon freedom of conscience, and the kingdom of God had been divinely declared to be within each human heart. The principles of such a system, of necessity and logically, brought into active exercise those qualities of mind and moral nature which were thus developed naturally and instinctively—the muscles of the mind, which, like the muscles of the body, are educated into strength, and both obey the same inherent natural law of growth by use—and thus it is plainly seen how liberty leads to strength and the health of the body politic. But the terrible and momentous issue was raised whether liberty of conscience was to be allowed, or were men to be forced into atheism, or become utterly irreligious, or compelled to a sacrilegious reception of the sacrament—no true conversion, but the deadly sin of hypocrisy and the desecration of what is holiest.

A TRIBUTE TO THE DUTCH PEOPLE.

When such an issue was framed, the morality of John Robinson and his associates, founded on religious principles, could not hesitate. And, as William Bradford has recorded, "being thus molested, and with no hope of their continuance there, by a joynte consent they resolved to goe into ye low Countries, where they heard was freedom for religion for all men." This was in 1607, and I will not recite the sad and well-known history of the arbitrary and cruel measures that were resorted to to prevent the departure of the congregation, and how finally, in broken detachments, distressed, despoiled, imperiled, by land and by sea, they came, after great hardships, together in Amsterdam, and in the course of another year were transferred to Leyden. And is not a tribute due, here and now, of gratitude and honor to the country which, in their hour of sore need, gave them welcome, protection, and generous toleration in an age of intolerance? The Netherlands was but a little patch of earth, rescued from the sea, warred over by man and the elements, without natural advantages other than those arising from contact with the sea, which was ever threatening to engulf them, yet, in the seventeenth century, this war-worn, weather-beaten strip had become the commercial center of Europe, an asylum for the victims of religious persecution, and is one of the phenomena of history. A military eye would have sought in vain for strong natural positions—no ranges of hills, no salient features for the combinations of resistance, and the delivery of assault—the breastworks of Holland consisted only in the stout hearts of her people, sustained by conscientious conviction, animated by hope and calm reliance on that Power with whom the wisdom of this world is but foolishness. In a fearful struggle, lasting forty years, it had gained its own liberties, against desperate odds, with an unflinching and pertinacious courage never paralleled in the annals of history, had made its soil the grave of 300,000 invading Spanish soldiers, and compelled an expenditure by Spain of more than 200,000,000 of ducats in the futile effort to subjugate it—the vain attempt to prescribe, as Motley says, "what was to be done in this world, and believed in the next." Taine says that in 1609 the Dutch Republic was two centuries ahead of the rest of Europe. Their idea was the organization of society for the public good, and this made them the instructors and civilizers of the modern world, and caused their country to become a haven of safety for the victims of persecutions for opinions' sake in France and in England. More books were printed in Holland in the seventeenth century than in all the other countries of Europe put together.

THE PILGRIMS IN LEYDEN.

Unquestionably the commercial freedom, the liberality of trade in the Dutch Republic induced many Englishmen to transfer their energies and fortunes to that country—for all the branches of liberty spring from the same stock and gather strength from the same ideas. Commerce has ever been the great civilizer of mankind, for it not only teaches honesty, without which commercial dealings are impossible, but it makes intelligence essential. In Leyden the congregation remained eleven years, John Robinson having been admitted in 1615 as a member of the Leyden University, pursuing diligently his studies in theology. It is noticeable that the same tolerant and generous welcome was extended to the Huguenot refugees, who equally found asylum in Holland; and a declaration recorded by Robinson contains the interesting historical fact: "Touching the ecclesiastical ministry—namely, of pastors for teaching, elders for ruling, and seasons for distributing the church contributions; as also for the two sacraments, baptism and the Lord's Supper—we agree in all things with the French reformed churches." But despite the liberty of conscience afforded by Holland, the English pilgrims were restless until they should again live under English laws, and that their children should retain the language and name of Englishmen. Their lives, too, were full of toil, and not of a kind to which they had been accustomed, for at home "they had only been used to a plain country life, and the innocent trade of husbandry."

THE VOYAGE OF THE MAYFLOWER.

They felt themselves "constrained to live by leave in a foreign land, exiled from home and country, spoiled of goods, destitute of friends, few in number and mean in condition." They were undoubtedly in danger of becoming absorbed in the community around them, of losing their distinctive church organization, their national identity, their language and its traditions. And believing this, John Robinson favored the settlement, and promoted the plan for their removal to the new colony beyond the Atlantic, and measures were taken to carry it out. He made it a condition precedent of the removal from Holland to Virginia that they should not be disturbed or injured in their new homes on account of their peculiar religious practices and opinions. Not without many delays and serious difficulties was the expedition fitted out; but finally, in August, 1620, the embarkation of the congregation took place, at Delft Haven, in the Speedwell, which was to meet her consort, the Mayflower, at Plymouth, from which port, and on Sept. 6, 1620, the two little vessels set sail. I need not recite to you how they were compelled to return to port, because the Speedwell was thought to be unseaworthy, and the Mayflower proceeded alone, bound for the Hudson River, but by stress of weather was forced northward, and, with her 101 passengers, men, women and children, in stormy weather made her landing on Cape Cod on Nov. 9. It was the intention of John Robinson to have followed, but circumstances prevented, and his death occurred a few years after; but in 1629 his sons, John and Isaac, with the remainder of the Scrooby congregation, joined in the settlement in America in which his heart was so enlisted, but which he was destined never to see.

THE OUTCOME OF THE EMIGRATION.

It is clear and plain to us now that the departure from England of this small body of humble men was a great step in the march of Christian civilization; it contained the seed of Christian liberty, freedom of inquiry, freedom of instruction, freedom of man's conscience. "Like unto a grain of mustard seed, which a man took and sowed in his field, which is indeed the least of all seeds, but when it is grown, it is the greatest among herbs, and becometh a tree so that the birds of the air come and lodge in the branches thereof." Little regard had John Robinson for worldly fortune, fame, or what goes by the general name of success. He deduced his duty from the profound principles disclosed to his personal conscience, enlightened by religion and founded on the moral order revealed to the world by the teachings and example of the Saviour Christ. His simple, unselfish, courageous life is illuminated by the principles of his divine Master, and therefore he still lives—and this is the origin of the edifice whose corner stone we lay today. In his Memorials of Canterbury, Dean Stanley—a kindred spirit to John Robinson—asks:

Had the great Stephen Langton, the cardinal archbishop, been asked which was most likely to endure, the Magna Charta which he won from John or the shrine which five years afterwards he consecrated in the presence of Henry III., he would, beyond all question, have said the shrine of St. Thomas. But we see what he could not see—we see that the charter has lasted, because it was founded on the eternal laws of truth, of justice and freedom; the shrine has vanished away, because it was founded on the passing opinion of the day, because it rested in ignorance, which was gradually dissolving, because it was entangled in exaggerated superstitions which were condemned by the wise and good, even in those very times.

And the works, the name, the fame of this simple pastor of a human flock will endure, and generations yet unborn shall seek in this church a touch of his vanished hand, a scent of his fragrant memory, redolent as it is with the sweet odor of unselfish devotion to the service of God and lovingkindness to his fellow-creatures.

JOHN ROBINSON'S NAME AND CHARACTER A TIE BETWEEN ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

He had lived not quite fifty years when he was called back to God, and on March 1, 1625, he heard "the one clear call," and, as was then written of him, "if either prayers, tears or means would have saved his life he would not have gone hence." John Robinson, a minister of Christ, died in exile and in poverty, and today two great nations are represented here in paying honor and respect to his memory and moral worth. His name and character create a tie between those who feel the kindred, not merely of a common language—the mother tongue of both peoples—but of the thoughts and feelings of which language is merely the clothing and the symbol; and out of these thoughts have grown convictions of mutual duty, from which we cannot detach ourselves if we would—and, as I sincerely believe, would not if we could. The wide ocean he never crossed, and which lies between his grave and the colony he planted on the other side, has become a bridge, and no longer is a barrier, but serves to bring together the peoples of the two countries who share in love and sympathy in his life and work. His memory is a tie of kindred—a recognition of the common trust committed to both nations to sustain the principles of civil and religious liberty, of which he was a fearless champion and under which has been so marvelously fulfilled the prophecy: "A little one shall become a thousand, and a small one a great nation."

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR NOTES.

Twenty French and English members in Paris make up a students' society which gives a welcome to visitors.

Resolutions against drilling the fire department on Sunday passed by the Endeavorers of Oakland, Cal., were followed by a petition to the proper authorities.

For August the members of the World's Christian Endeavor Prayer Chain are asked to pray for young Christians away from home, that, as they are scattered by the vacation season, the knowledge of Christ may be spread abroad by them, and that their consistent lives may everywhere tell for the Master.

To prevent loss by the summer vacation the Sunday school committee of the society at West Medford, Mass., asked each member of the school to fill out a card giving the time when he expected to leave and to return, and his address while away. The committee proposes to send at least one letter to each absent one.

Some of the delegates traveled more than 500 miles to be present at Japan's fourth convention, in Kyoto. Greetings were received from South Dakota. At the consecration meeting each delegate gave a response. A pleasant reception was given in the rooms of the Doshisha girls' school. At a business meeting it was decided to establish the headquarters of the Japanese United Society at Osaka.

At the Chinese annual convention, held in Shanghai, 37 societies and more than half a dozen denominations were represented. At the time of the roll-call there was a congregation of between 500 and 600. An address on methods of Bible study was so well received that it is to be printed for circulation among the societies. The Chinese societies now have about 2,700 members, the increase during the past year being larger than the entire membership two years ago.

The first Christian Endeavor convention in Siam was held lately in Laos. The first society among this people was formed in January of last year; and although the Christian population does not number more than 3,000, 20 societies were reported, with a membership of more than 600. Fourteen societies were represented, and the delegate from the most distant one had walked eight days to reach the meetings. There had been much prayer for the convention before it met, and there were frequent pauses in the business and discussions for a short season of prayer. It was found that some societies understood the pledge to require each member to take part in every meeting by prayer and by reading the Scripture, while others understood that each one must explain a passage of Scripture at each meeting.

The Home

THE DREAM-CHILD.

Alone, unwedded, past her prime,
Her faded face still wore a smile,
As if some secret, sweet and dear,
She knew, and brooded on the while—
Some hidden joy that kept life fair,
And lifted her above despair.

Ah, me! you could not guess the dream
She cherished in her maiden heart.
Once to have voiced it would have been
To make her wintry life-blood start
Up, till the wrinkled cheeks aflame
Burned with a virgin's piteous shame.

Long years ago she loved, and then—
Who knows?—he died, or proved untrue,
And so she lived a maiden still.
He never wed who rode to woo
Through soft spring mornings long ago,
And time had blurred her ancient woe.

But when the day was sunk in night,
Close by the embers of her fire
She sat and rocked, and to herself
Feigned that she had her heart's desire.
'Twas then that on her withered breast
A little dream-child took its rest.

How sweet to raise a quavering voice
And sing a tender lullaby;
To feel its head against her neck
And softly soothe its noiseless cry!
It made her life so bright and glad—
That little child she might have had!

Her heart was full of motherhood,
It's yearnings all had been denied.
She fed its hunger with a dream
And smiled where others might have sighed;
And in the little dream-child's face
A likeness vague she loved to trace.

Nay, do not smile! our dreams are coarse—
Of gold or fame we could not win.
Hers was divine. I love to think
Of that bent figure, worn and thin,
By flickering firelight, wholly blest,
Holding her dream-child on her breast.

I think in wondrous heaven, where
The good God makes our hopes come true,
He may give back my love to me,
He may give back your youth to you.
But for that maiden undefiled
I know he has a little child.

So many interests occupy women nowadays that we are prone to overlook the importance of simple, true living, or what may be called the value of everydayness. Who does not know the difficulty of proportioning one's time and strength to dust, puddings, missions, clothes and culture? Who does not long sometimes for a genuine hospitality which is of self and not of cut glass and contemptible pride? How shall we learn to do little things in a large spirit and to see the divineness of drudgery? How realize that it is not small cares but petty thoughts which make a woman's life narrow? These are some of the questions which obtrude themselves in seasons of unrest, or when stimulating calls to outside service make us chafe against the confinement of home duties. Abby W. May once showed a fine appreciation of relative values in her reply to the friend who asked, "Are you busy and can you stop a moment?" She answered, "I am always busy but I can always stop." Let us remind ourselves that we are free children of the eternities, not slaves to convention and fashion and pray:

> Take from our souls the strain and stress,
> And let our ordered lives confess
> The beauty of thy peace.

"The majority of bad men," said a distinguished physician, "became so between the ages of thirteen and seventeen. Those years bear the same relation to manhood that the first three years of life do to childhood, and their importance is greater." Yet we constantly see mothers who sacrifice themselves to any extent for the baby, but who seem wholly indifferent to the same child when he has reached the "awkward age." The change from boyhood to manhood is often very sudden, and the boy, at this period, is usually overgrown, awkward, intolerant and opinionated, in short, generally disagreeable, as his friends do not hesitate to inform him. But it should be remembered that it is a far more trying time for the boy than for any one else. Rapid growth and development tax his nerves and strength, making him irritable, lazy and dissatisfied with life. He is too big to play with the children and yet he is not accepted as an equal by the young men. If his mother fail him at this time, the chances are that he will grow reckless and drift hopelessly away from her. It is only by the most watchful and tender care that our boys can be so guided through the dangers of early manhood as to increase, like their divine Master, not only "in wisdom and stature," but also "in favor with God and man."

HOME AUTHORITY.

BY JULIET H. BRAND.

It goes without saying that parents love their children, but the methods of manifesting this love vary with the times and the persons, and the study of these varying methods must be a fruitful department of sociology. The idea of parental authority as a manifestation of love is apparently at its lowest ebb just at the present, and that of indulgence, or, rather, withdrawal of authority, is at the full. The method may perhaps be said to be like that of Eli, whose only attempt at government was by protest, rather than by authority, the "Why do ye so?" method. This state of things is fully approved by the children but is it producing a good effect and will it bear the test of reason?

As for effects, they are obvious. Any one may decide for himself whether they are good. We see the boys smoking, though the parents protest. We see the boys and girls tearing over the country on their wheels on Sunday, though the parents who furnished the wheels disapprove entirely. We see them attending places of amusement which the fathers and mothers have never frequented. We see them spending lavishly on amusements, dress and palate, though the parents are self-denying Christian people. We see them so occupied in ways of their own choosing that they have no time to be helpful in the home.

But, setting aside the results of this state of things, is it reasonable that the character and influence of a Christian home should be determined by the children rather than by the parents? What right has the parent to allow the child of no experience to settle matters of vital importance? The real trouble is we fathers and mothers are cowardly and it is easier to yield than to stand firm for what our judgment tells us is the best way. Of course wise parents allow large liberty in everything that does not affect the integrity of the Christian home, but there they surely must make a stand.

The overwhelming argument offered by the young for overruling the wishes of their parents is that "So and so, professing Christians, and the nicest kind of people, approve of this, that and the other." The sooner we throw this argument overboard the better. Professing Christians often make terrible mistakes. One only has to go back a few years to find professing Christians torturing and burning each other and, in fact, blindly committing heinous sins of almost every sort while still, perhaps, exhibiting some really Christian virtues. What others do is no basis for argument. Each individual Christian has but one infallible example and each Christian home but one teacher and that is Christ.

Is it not certain then that every parent has the absolute duty in his own home to enforce Christlike ideals, as long as he furnishes the home, the love, the care, the money? If filial obedience is not required from the child the parent is simply a slave and a drudge and the child is master. The parent is the learner and the child the teacher, and we see experience overruled by inexperience, age by youth, judgment by desire, unselfishness by selfishness.

Put the reins into the hands of the children and the love of pleasure will dominate every home. This love of pleasure ought to be prominent in the child's mind. It is natural and right that it should be. The child, however, is not supposed to govern itself, but to be guided by a loving wisdom which regulates and trains this youthful and all-absorbing passion for a good time.

We must admit, then, that the Lord expects more of us than to wash our little children's faces and to mend the clothes of the older ones. It must certainly be not only a right but a duty and not a tyranny for parents to establish a parental Christian law in the home and to require conformity thereto. All this, with the definite understanding that this is so because God requires it, and also with the understanding that each child will have to settle all questions both of expediency and of right and wrong again, independently, when he reaches years of maturity and self-support.

AFIELD WITH YOUNG NATURALISTS.

A PILE OF STONES.

BY REV. I. O. RANKIN.

In three country walks Jim Burton had begun a geological collection. Not that he knew anything about geology, but he wanted to know, which is sometimes better than a great deal of knowledge. He had spread his "collection" on the table to show his cousin Ned, whom he was visiting. It was not large, but he had made it as varied as possible, selecting bits from the gravel pit and quarry and the river bank, as unlike in color and form as possible.

"Pooh!" said Ned, when he came in from school, "is that all? That's nothing but a pile of stones."

Jim felt rather hurt at the tone in which his cousin spoke, but he knew that Ned had been in school all day and wanted to go fishing, so they started off without another word.

After supper Dr. Strang, Ned's father, called the boys to the table on which the collection lay and began to sort it over. First of all, to Jim Burton's great surprise, he put together much the larger number, including those with the brightest and most varied colors, saying, "These are all alike."

"But," said Jim, "see how different they look, white, yellow, pink, brown and black."

"Yes, there is more or less iron to color them, but they are all nearly the same—just as the wood of a house may be painted any color you choose, and still be wood. It is all quartz, or silica, more or less mixed with other things. You see it always shows straight lines when it is broken, though it may be worn into curves by rolling."

"But here is one that doesn't look like the others. It is round and dull."

"I'm glad you noticed that. It is hardened mud outside, but I'm pretty sure you will find a nest of quartz inside of it. It's what we call a geode. Shall I break it open?"

"O, yes!"

Two or three strokes with the sharp edge of a hammer broke it open like an egg, and showed a hollow lined with beautiful crystals of glittering white.

"That's rather a rare find hereabouts. I suppose you got it by the river."

"Yes; and this one too."

"That's common enough. It's what we used to call a 'lucky stone'; it has a ring of quartz around it. That stands for an earthquake."

"What do you mean, Uncle Ned? For an earthquake? I thought it was just a ring on the outside, like a streak of paint."

"Let me break it open and see."

It was a dark purple stone with a white ring, and when it was broken apart the white streak ran through it like the cream in a piece of layer cake.

"But you haven't told us what you mean by an earthquake."

"Use your imagination, Jim. Do you suppose this stone was always as small as it is now?"

"O, no. I suppose it was broken off a bigger stone."

"And that?"

"Off some cliff or mountain."

"Well, then, how do you suppose the quartz got in?"

"Do you mean that the whole mountain cracked apart just this little bit when the earthquake came?"

"Every earthquake means a rock crack, I suppose, just as every settling of a house on its foundations means a crack in the plaster. As for the quartz in the crack, that was probably left there by steam or water coming up from the hot center of the earth and as full of quartz as Ned's glass of lemonade last night was full of sugar."

Ned winced at this, but asked, "But if the rock was cracked all the way up, why wouldn't the steam escape?"

"It was all done underground, deep down under a whole mountain, and there it had no chance."

"And what became of the mountain?"

"Here is a bit of it, or of another like it. We call this sandstone. It is made of old mountain grindings cemented together after they have been put in place by water. In some parts of the country the bits cemented together are larger, and then we call it pudding-stone or conglomerate."

"I know," said Jim; "I've seen lots of it near Boston."

"And when you go to Washington you may see some beautiful polished columns in the Capitol which are made of a different kind of pudding-stone, in which the plums and the pudding are all marble; but the bits are broken, and not rounded like the plums in the Boston pudding, and it goes by the name of breccia, and has evidently been put on the fire and boiled like a real pudding."

"And what are these which you have put in the other piles?"

"These are sandstones and slates which show no signs of life, and here are stones with the making of which at some time living creatures had a part to play. They are limestones, slates and sandstones, with traces of the life of the age in which they were made. The slates are mudstones and sometimes show little trace of life, but when you split them apart carefully, as you would open the leaves of a book, you will find shells or fragments here and there. Some of the limestones have been ground over like the sandstone and have more or less clay mixed with them, and some are nearly pure lime. Here is a bit with shells appearing all over the surface. When you go to Florida and visit St. Augustine you will find all the rock there (coquina, they call it) made up of shells cemented together. A piece of chalk under the microscope would show you the same thing, except that the shells are very small and soft. The coquina was made in shallow water, the chalk on a deep ocean bottom."

"But how did the chalk cliffs get up above the sea if they were made at the bottom of the deep ocean?"

"There comes in the earthquake again. The crust of the earth seems to be always moving, rumpled, as I rumple this sheet of paper, by internal forces, so that what was up goes down, and what was down comes up."

"All at once, or slowly?"

"Sometimes one and sometimes the other. The shores of New Jersey, for instance, seem to be slowly sinking, and in other places they are rising, and islands have disappeared or been thrown up in a day. We know most about the shore because we have the sea level to measure by. About all these limestones, sandstones, slates and shales were made under shallow water, which usually means near the shore."

"But how did they all come to be here in Albrodale?"

"Ah! that's another story. The baker keeps one set of men to make his bread and another to distribute it. The making of rock is one thing and the breaking and scattering it another. I can't take time to tell you about that tonight."

WHERE DID IT GO?

Where did yesterday's sunset go
When it faded down the hills so slow,
And the gold grew dim and the purple light,
Like an army with banners passed from sight?
Will its flush go into the golden rod,
Its thrill to the purple aster's nod,
Its crimson fleck the maple bough,
And the autumn glory begin from now?

Deeper than flower fields sank the glow
Of the silent pageant passing slow.
It flushed all night in many a dream,
It thrilled in the folding hush of a prayer,
It glided into a poet's song,
It is setting still in a picture rare;
It is changed by the miracle none can see
To the shifting lights of a symphony;
And in resurrections of faith and hope
The glory died on the shining slope,
For it left its light on the hills and seas
That rim a thousand memories.

Closet and Altar

Prayers are to the soul what the dew of God is to the flowers. Why should not that gracious dew fall even now and always for all of us upon the fields of life?

We ourselves are the real word, the life-utterance which speech often falsifies. There are faces that never deceive or mislead us. A spiritual nature can but be frank and honest, because its foundation stones are laid in the truth and it knows that nothing else holds. It is in us as human beings instinctively to recognize and hate insincerity. Nobody is in the end deceived by expression that is merely outward and perfunctory. Our inner life is transparent; it cannot conceal itself; if it is a true life, it has no need or desire of concealment.—Lucy Larcom.

Lord give me a straightforward, accurate, imperious knowledge of myself—a knowledge that endures no lies and permits no equivocation; a knowledge that is not morbid or timid; an open, manly, sunshiny knowledge of my evil and my good. But with the disclosure of my weakness disclose also thy power. With my sins show me also thy forgiveness and thy salvation. With my virtues show me, far ahead of me, the perfection thou dost require. Let me not know myself unless I can also know thee.—A. R. Wells.

O God of truth, whose living word upholds
whate'er hath breath,
Look down on thy creation, Lord, enslaved
by sin and death.

Set up thy standard, Lord, that we, who claim a heavenly birth,
May march with thee to smite the lies that vex thy groaning earth.

Then God of truth, for whom we long, thou who wilt hear our prayer,
Do thine own battle in our hearts and slay
the falsehood there.

Yea, come! then, tried as in the fire, from every lie set free,
Thy perfect truth shall dwell in us, and we shall live in thee.

—Thomas Hughes.

We come to thee, O God, in the name of Christ who is the truth, to ask that thou wilt cleanse our hearts from falsehood. From all love of deception, from all vain imaginations, from careless insincerity and trust in refuges of lies, deliver us now and evermore. O send out thy light and thy truth; let them lead us! Enlighten our mind, instruct our conscience, fortify our will, that we may be true followers of our Lord in all sincerity of heart and uprightness of life. May our speech be in charity without guile, loving the truth and peace. Thou knowest how we walk in ignorance and prejudice, the familiar words of falsehood which we bear and speak. Pardon us that we have been content in this false witness. Give us a growing and abiding love for all things that are pure and honest and of good report with thee. So teach us to follow in the steps of Jesus who did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth, that through us also some may rise to the knowledge of the truth which is revealed of thee. And thine shall be the glory evermore. Amen.

66. TRANSPOSITION.

Rest by the wayside, pilgrim, try,
For the heart grows sick of its madcap quest;
Study the beauties that round thee lie—
Rest!

The soul grown mad in its lust to fly
Rushes pellmell at the world's behest,
Nor heeds it the landscape it passes by.

Break thy soul's TWO for the ONE on high;
Walk in His ways whose ways are best,
And find at the end, with a last, long sigh,
Rest.

M O E R O H

Spell from one letter to the next—up, down, right, left or diagonally. Form as many words as may be necessary, removing each letter as it is used, and using it only once. The object is to form the largest number of points. Any letter in the first syllable counts one point unless a repetition, two in the second syllable, four in the third, and so on. The first repetition adds one to the value of a letter, the second adds two, the third adds four, and so on. For example: In OOLOGY, O counts 1; O, 3; L, 2; O, 7; G, 8; Y, 8. Total, 29.

68. A TRAY OF FRUIT.

(In each couplet "TWO" is transposed to make "ONE," the name of a fruit.)

I.

These ONE riped by a stream where wavelets TWO
The mossy bank whereon their parent grew.

II.

But from my hillside orchard came those ONE
Like TWO of live coal glowing in the sun.

III.

Just note this luscious ONE'S rich emerald sheen,
And fibrous, TWO-hued lacework o'er the green.

IV.

And here are amber ONE, all gathered fresh,
Their TWO-like stems loosed in their mellow flesh.

V.

And ONES, whose soft, rich tints no words can paint,
For adjectives seem TWO and praise but faint.

VI.

Then, lastly, in a corner, these ONE view,
As acid as some heartless cynic's TWO!

Answers received to Tangles of July 2: Mrs. C. B. R. Hazeltine, Melrose Highlands, Mass., 59, 60; Emily E. Tupper, Concord, Ill., 59, 60; J. R. L., Malden, Mass., 59, 60. To Tangles of June 18: P. J. Stone, Shelburne, Mass., 55, 57; A. C. T., Providence, R. I., 55; Charles Jacobus, Springfield, Mass., 57 (five answers). Mr. Jacobus has been trying the mathematical puzzle in which it is required to arrange the ten digits—1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 0—in such a manner that, on performing the addition or other operations indicated, the result will be 100. He has over 50 answers, and thinks over 1,000 are possible.

THE PRIZE TANGLING.

Of the numerous lists of Characteristic Initials our friends have formed on the great names given in Tangles of July 2, none is quite perfect. Nearly all lists, however, contain some very neat specimens. "John Howard Payne, Judged Home Popular," and "Samuel F. B. Morse, Secured Fame By Messages," are from one list, which however, also has "Joseph Lister, Justly Loved."

As a whole, the following list is adjudged the best, winning the prize for M. F. P., Cottage City, Mass.: 1. Francis Bacon, Famous Barrister. 2. Thomas B. Macaulay, Truthful Books Made. 3. Alessandro Volta, Aided Voltaism. 4. John G. Saxe, Jolly Good Singer. 5. Alexander Hamilton, Assisted Honorably. 6. William Cullen Bryant, Wise, Cheerful Bard. 7. John H. Vincent, Judicious, Helpful Veteran. 8. James D. Dana, Justly Dignified Department. 9. Samuel T. Coleridge, ang Tender Carols. 10. James Russell Lowell, Justly Renowned Light. 11. John Milton, Judged Mysteries. 12. Samuel F. B. Morse, Sent First Baltimore Message. 13. Salmon P. Chase, Saved Public Credit. 14. Nathaniel P. Willis, Nice Pleasant Writer. 15. James Watt, Judiciously Watched. 16. Lindley Murray, Language Methods 17. John Howard Payne, Joyous Home Poet. 18. Charles Kingsley, Christian Knight. 19. Joseph Lister, Joined Limbs. 20. Giuseppi Garibaldi, Good General.

If it had been complete, the list of Charles Jacobus, Springfield, Mass., would have been the best. It is here given; 1. Fostered Bribery, or Favored Booklore. 2. Talented Beyond Measure. 3. Accomplished Votary. 4. Jolly Good Songster. 5. America's Help. 6. Wrote Captivating Books. 7. Joyously Honoring Virtue. 8. Jehovah's Deep Decipherer. 9. Singularly Talented Conversationist. 10. Jovial Rhyming Littérateur. 11. Jehovah's Minstrel. 12. Space's First Bold Master. 13. Secretary Public Coffers, or Sought Presidential Candidacy. 14. Narrative Public Writer. 15. Jack-at-all-trades Workman. 16. Language Master. 17. Justly Honored Poet.

THREE MORE FAMOUS HYMNS.

Jesus, lover of my soul.

One day Charles Wesley was sitting by an open window when he saw a hawk sweeping down toward a little bird that was flitting about in the glad sunshine. The poor thing was much frightened and tried to find some place of refuge. Seeing an open window and a man sitting near it the bird flew in its extremity toward it, and with a beating heart and quivering wing found refuge in Mr. Wesley's bosom. He kindly sheltered it from the threatened danger and saved it from a cruel death. At that time he was suffering from severe trials and was needing a refuge in his own time of trouble, so he took up his pen and wrote this sweet hymn, which has comforted multitudes in sorrow and danger.

When marshaled on the nightly plain.

Kirk White, the author of this familiar hymn, was sailing one stormy night on a rocky coast with only a lantern to guide him, and under the inspiration of the hour he composed this hymn.

Little drops of water,
Little grains of sand.

The author of this popular poem was Mrs. Julia Carney. Before her marriage, when studying phonography in Boston, she was asked to give an impromptu exercise on the blackboard. Only ten minutes were allowed, but in that time she wrote the first verse of the poem to which she gave the title of Little Things. It has been a favorite in Sunday school exhibitions from that time on, and has been recited and sung thousands of times. Subsequently she added three more verses.

Discontented young men, who are unhappy because they accumulate money so slowly, ought to read the sentiments of Mr. Andrew Carnegie, the well-known millionaire, as he is reviewing the poverty and hard toil of his early life. He says: "You know how people are all moaning about poverty as being a great evil, and it seems to be accepted that if people only had money and were rich that they would be happy and more useful and get more out of life. There was never a graver mistake. As a rule there is more happiness, more genuine satisfaction and a truer life in the humble cottages of the poor than in the palaces of the rich."

The Conversation Corner.

MY DEAR CORNERERS: I suppose you are having your holiday-time now—at home, if not away from home—but as I have not received many vacation letters or pictures from you yet, I will tell you about my outing first. It was not long nor eventful, but it was pleasant, for it took me back into the hill country of New England, where to me both nature and people are always beautiful and interesting.

The interest began soon after I had taken my train at the Union Station—look up my route on your map—in a quartet of happy children who sat near me, evidently going on their vacation. After a while I went back and sat with them. I learned that they were from Cambridge and seemed to know all our members there. Then I showed them, in The Congregationalist of that week, the picture of the Cambridge "Captains of Ten." To my surprise the oldest boy exclaimed: "Why, I am one of the Captains myself—there is my picture, in front of Miss ——!" Was it not curious that I should happen to show to the boy, who was an entire stranger, his own photograph?

A hundred miles from Boston I left the cars and rode with an old schoolmate into a beautiful mountain town, the hills splendid with chestnut blossoms, the valleys covered over with corn. In my boyhood the town was famous for the finest oxen and richest butter in all the region roundabout, although in these days of "creameries" and farm machinery drawn by horses this is all changed. Better still, this town, like so many others of the hill country, has sent out good men and women to bless the country and the world, far-away Palestine and Persia holding sacred the names of missionaries reared within its borders. After two enjoyable days in this grand old town, I crossed a river and went (by carriage) up its narrow valley.

On either side were rugged, wooded hills. The road by gentle ascent followed the winding, rumbling stream, which teams could cross here and there, by ford in summer, by ice in winter. Between the river and the road, for several miles, was a continuous row of maples, planted, the venerable minister told me, through the agency of a few good men, long years ago. In front of his "manse" was a fine group of them, "the twelve apostles," and one extra, "St. Paul." Another schoolmate of nearly fifty years ago appeared to continue the drive. Farmhouses, a hamlet, a church, a village, nestled among the smaller hills. No wonder that the minister of olden time here used to say that he expected the millennium would begin in such a parish as his!

It was pleasant to meet Cornerers and Corner readers at every turn. At one farmhouse I saw an old man of ninety-one and his grandchildren of proper Corner age! At another home was an Iowa reader, at another still correspondents from Brooklyn, and at last, as I started for the cars—which followed the river from the great valley below till they actually ran into and under the mountain above—who should appear to walk with me but Mrs. Kate Upson Clark, whose name is so familiar to you in the Home Department of our paper. Nor was this true in these hill towns alone. In other places which I visited, in Vermont and New Hampshire, whose boundaries I crossed, I found members and readers, young and old—I had no idea there were so many of us! (Nearly everybody asked about D. F.!)

Now, do you ask what that little old house is in the picture? It is the dearest house in all the world to me—the home of my boyhood! I walked around it the first evening after I reached the town. I went to say good-by to it and pick a leaf from the syringa bush over the front door the morning I came away. As it happened to be unoccupied just then I borrowed the key and visited it again and again. There was the "living-room"—sitting-room, dining-room, and, in winter time, kitchen too. There was the "east room"—the parlor, heated only by a fireplace, and used as little as the other was much. There was the "north room"—my father's room, with the book cupboard in the wall and the tall drug cupboard in the corner, with its shelves for bottles and its rows of drawers to hold other medicines—my hand almost instinctively opened that which used to contain the licorice! In the cellar were the closets next to the chimney where my mother stored the unnumbered mince pies made at Thanksgiving time and the cookies of weekly manufacture, the latter so convenient for the pocket when I went to the "further pasture" for the cows!

At the right-hand window was my bed room, at the other the unfinished place at the head of the back stairs where I had my writing table—an old chest—my little bookcase, my "cabinet" and my scrap-books. You can see how easy it was to get out of the windows and run around on the roof, and an older boy who used to live there too, and who was with me the other day, showed me where, in attempting to go out to the end of the shed ridgepole to put up a windmill, he rolled off by the chimney and broke his arm. I went up the steep stairs into the "wood-shed chamber" to verify a faint remembrance of my earliest childhood of pasting up pictures there, and to my delight found, under the dust, beside the little window at the end (which the tree hides from sight), several cuts from the old spelling book, "Of the Boy that stole Apples," "The country Maid and her Milk pail" and "The Partial Judge." (For further information as to those pictorial works of art consult your grandparents!)

On the bench in the "stoop" we used to sit and watch the thunderstorm in the west; from the old oaken bucket we drank the purest water; on the common beyond the house I played; at the brick store opposite I traded the walnuts I had gathered for a "Barlow knife"; back of the store was the same old rock that my playmate and I tried to excavate, expecting to come presently upon the heads of Chinamen picking tea; at the foot of the hill was the river where we sailed our raft, and across the bridge the "side hill" where we got the first mayflowers.

But sitting on the bench was lonely now! No voice replied in the vacant rooms; the well-sweep was gone, and the flower-beds in the garden which my mother loved; my playmate was far away, immersed in the business of a Western city; few of the friends of my boyhood could I find, and they were not the same I had left forty years ago!

As I sat and thought, I decided to tell you this, boys and girls. Make the most of these childhood days of yours; be happy yourselves, and make others happy around you. What you learn now in home or in school you will keep all your lives—learn right things and learn them thoroughly. What you do now, good things or bad, little things as well as large, you will remember forever—do what you will be glad to remember when you come back to your homes, forty, fifty, sixty years hence!

LESSON FOR AUG. 9. 2 Sam. 10: 8-19.

DAVID'S VICTORIES.

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D. D.

"The kingdom of David" came to mean for Israel all that the nation hoped for. The devout people expected that it would be established forever and that his descendants would rule over it without end. That kingdom is of interest to us because it typified and prepared the way for the kingdom which Jesus, the Son of David, proclaimed, and to which we, as his disciples, belong. We have studied in previous lessons the internal organization of the kingdom of David. We have seen how he became king at Hebron of his own tribe of Judah, how the other tribes came under his sway, how he set up the ark of God in Jerusalem and built his palace there, making it the center of the religious and civil life of the kingdom. He exercised the offices of prophet, priest and king. He made laws and appointed leaders. He introduced into the public worship an elaborate ritual. He wrote the songs for the nation. He brought the life of the people around one common center, gave to them common interests and united aims. No other man stands forth in Jewish history of so great importance in preparing the way for the everlasting kingdom of God.

But the extension of the kingdom by conquering the territory of other tribes was not less necessary than its thorough internal organization. Our lesson gives instances of the campaigns which resulted in a kingdom under David reaching from the borders of Egypt on the south and the Mediterranean Sea on the west to the river Euphrates. The study of these particular instances brings out no inspiring truth. They should rather be taken as illustrations of that great movement which gave Israel for a time rank among leading nations and which helped to work out the idea of the kingdom of God. We may, then, profitably study David's wars as to their:

1. Motives. David regarded himself as the servant of God, called to lead the chosen people to realize God's promises. Long before God had made a covenant with Abraham [Gen. 15: 18], promising to give to his descendants the land which David conquered. He must have felt in his wars that he was fulfilling a divine purpose. The consciousness of it appears in his songs, which became popular with all the people. Whoever is confident that he is executing the will of God is brave. Whether the difficulties in his way be regiments of armed men or obstacles made by poverty, want of friends or of opportunity, he will have more than ordinary strength to overcome them. Common men and women have become heroes and some have made themselves remembered by future generations simply by their conviction that they are appointed by God to do a specific work for him. Any one is fortunate who has such a task set before him, however hard the task may be.

But the land to be conquered was not to be for Israel's use alone. The promise which lifted the nation above those around it was, "In thee shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." David organized his army and directed his campaigns in the name of God and for the world's good. He foresaw a greater kingdom than that over which he reigned. Himself only an humble servant in God's hands, he held to the promise that out of his loins should spring a ruler before whom the nations should bow and who should rule the world in righteousness. That great achievement, the perfecting of the kingdom of God, in which David bore a part, we also may share in as followers of the King of kings. To conquer the world by the might of truth and love is the business of the army of God. David did something toward it. We may do more, because the great conflict is now far advanced, and we may send the message of our king to all the nations.

2 Its methods. David thoroughly organized his army. He had his own bodyguard, the 600, mostly foreigners, who fought with him in the days when as yet he had no kingdom. He had twelve divisions of 25,000 men each, and each divided into regiments and companies. He had brave officers who had won their rank by faithful service and brilliant exploits, and his general-in-chief was his own nephew, Joab. When one has a great work like David's to do for God, he has the highest incentive to do it well. David employed every device and every instrument at his command to secure victory.

He conquered the Philistines who had held the rich plain of Sharon and garrisoned their capital. He subdued the Moabites on the southeast [2 Sam. 8; 1 Chron. 18] Then came his opportunity to take possession of the land of the Ammonites on the east, as our lesson describes. With them were allied the peoples north of them who occupied Syria as far as Damascus. Joab fought both armies at once, he leading one division and his brother, Abishai, the other. He won a great victory, which David followed up by a greater over the Syrian hosts, so that his kingdom extended, as had been promised, "from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth"; that is, from the Mediterranean to the Red Sea and from the Euphrates to the Mediterranean coast.

It is not necessary to attempt to justify all the deeds of David or his officers in these campaigns. The execution of two-thirds of the Moabites who had been captured would be condemned, and justly, by the rules of modern warfare. General Joab, though brave, was cruel and treacherous. The record must be judged by the standards of that time. But the object sought was worthy of the children of God. They strove to gain it in a spirit of loyalty to him; and they stand, in their day, worthy examples to those who live in greater light and are called to still larger service.

3. Its consequences. David turned the spoils he won into the treasury of God, to beautify his temple and to cultivate worthy worship of God. He thus kept down the spirit of avarice and made the people realize that their mission was an unselfish one. He reminded them in speech and song that God was their king and himself God's servant. He fostered the conviction that their kingdom, won by divine favor giving victory to their arms, ever pointed to something better for the whole world. David's victories are ours. Jesus Christ, the Son of David, carried to greater triumphs the successes which David won. In his great name we fight, though not now with carnal weapons, against the enemies of our King. We gain new courage by telling over again the stories of those ancient battles, and thinking on the prowess of those who fought in the name, and for the sake, of the Lord of hosts. Our Christian life is a warfare, and it can be accomplished only in the spirit of devotion and in the consciousness of bearing a great commission which have made David the hero of all the ages of Christian history.

What do I find? Generally nothing beyond the reprehension of self, the painful detail of a miserable heart. Prayer had recourse to for two hours at a time, and still no comfort! But is this the way to realize God in the heart? Is it not likely that an everlasting recurrence to self, and to the unprofitableness of the human heart, will raise the soul to heavenly exercises? Would it not be better to fill the heart with God, God's love, God's deeds, God's mercies, and to eclipse, as it were, our own wantings with the grace and bounty which is from above?—Samuel Lee.

BOOK REVIEWS.

IAN MACLAREN IN A NEW LITERARY ROLE.

When a writer exceptionally successful in one branch of literature undertakes an entirely different form of composition, the reading public is first of all curious to know whether in the new field he will enhance or impair his reputation as an author. So when Ian Maclaren, one of the greatest story writers of the century, sends forth in The Mind of the Master a distinctively religious if not formally theological work our first query is whether it is as good of its kind as our cherished Bonnie Brier Bush.

Yet it must be remembered that John Watson existed long before his literary double, Ian Maclaren, moved to tears and to smiles thousands of men and women on both sides the Atlantic, and that as a preacher and teacher in one of Liverpool's most prominent pulpits he has for years been stating and enforcing Christian truth in some such fashion as it is set forth on the pages of The Mind of the Master. Moreover, since his fame as a story writer was established, and along with his more recent and current production of longer or shorter pieces of fiction, he has been writing articles, many of which The Congregationalist has published, designed to foster right thinking on supreme themes and larger and better living. Some of these have been collected in a little volume called The Upper Room, reviewed by us about six months ago and which we now as then pronounce an uncommonly good devotional book.

The Mind of the Master is a distinct advance, however, as respects size, continuity, tone and teaching. Dr. Watson has evidently intended that this handsome volume of nearly 350 pages should go out as representative of his mature and measurably systematized thought on subjects that are engaging the attention of Christian thinkers the world over. Without being polemical the book has the savor of controversy. A plea for the widest tolerance, it is nevertheless at points rigidly dogmatic. Permeated with the same good feeling that continually bubbles over in the Brier Bush stories, it is at once a protest and a challenge, a protest against what he considers false and exclusive in institutional and conventional Christianity, a challenge to a fresh and earnest grapple with the words of Jesus not only to establish their paramount authority but to discover their real meaning and to apply them to life.

Viewed as a literary production the book will not disappoint those who have been charmed with Dr. Watson's previous writings. The same power of clear and forceful statement is evident. The striking antitheses whose frequent use is a weakness when we come to pass judgment upon the teaching of the book nevertheless make every page interesting reading. The style is every now and then seasoned with a rural tang, as when he says: "Some one discovers that the water of life is clearer and sweeter from the spring than from the cistern and shows the grass-grown path to the spring." Dr. Watson's wonderful gift of paraphrasing appears at its best on page 55 in his translation of the Beatitudes. The volume also gives continual evidence of his wide range of knowledge and of his easy, comprehensive and in the main accurate grasp of other systems and departments of thought than that in which he has been especially trained. He is thus able to enrich his book with illustrations drawn from a great variety of sources and one lays it down with a pleasing sense of having had personal intercourse with a man of unusual culture. The humor is less pronounced than we expected to find it but it lurks in the background of not a few sentences, particularly in antithetical statements like this: "Before and since Adam's day people have been invited to hold an inquest on the sin of Adam and have discharged this function with keen intellectual interest. It was Jesus who made sin of even date and invited every hearer to see the tragedy of Eden in his own experience."

Dr. Watson's point of view, which has determined the title of the book, is clearly set forth in the first three chapters, whose headings, respectively, are: Jesus Our Supreme Teacher, The Development of Truth, and the Sovereignty of Character. He goes on thence to interpret what he thinks to be the Mind of the Master with regard to faith, immortality, sin, suffering, fatherhood and kindred great themes. The chapter Devotion to a Person the Dynamic of Religion, and the chapter Judgment according to Type, will best satisfy the common Christian consciousness and arouse the least dissent, while the chapter The Kingdom of God, where, as Dr. Denney in his review in the British Weekly has well shown, Dr. Watson arrays Jesus and Paul in unjustifiable antagonism, is the least satisfactory and convincing chapter of the book.

The author's basal thought permeates the entire book, but may be grasped at close range in two or three passages like the following.

> The religion of Protestants, or let us say Christians, is not the Bible in all its parts, but, first of all, that portion which is its soul, by which the teaching of prophets and apostles must be judged—the very words of Jesus.
> Among all the creeds of Christendom the only one which has the authority of Christ himself is the Sermon on the Mount.
> When any one writes as if St. Paul were in the matter of teaching not only the equal of Jesus but also his superior—giving to the world more precious truth than the gospels—he has surely somewhat failed in reverence for the Master.
> What has to be laid down in the strongest terms and held in perpetual remembrance is that Jesus gave in substance final truth, and that no one apostle or saint could or did add anything to the original deposit, however much he might expound or enforce it.

It is here that we probe to the heart of the question at issue today among the thinkers of Protestant Christendom. It is true that this volume is not meant to be a treatise on systematic theology. Dr. Watson's ruling desire, as we apprehend it, has been to grasp and declare with all the literary skill of which he is the possessor the mental attitude and the inmost passionate convictions of Jesus respecting those mighty concerns of the soul upon which men will never cease to think, and in regard to which they will not fail to think with ever increasing clearness and satisfaction in proportion as Christ, in fulfillment of his own promise, gives his disciples the guiding spirit of truth. In this undertaking Dr. Watson has scored a more than ordinary success. But he cannot escape the criticism of those who dissect every book to find its fundamental conception of truth. Judged by this test the book fails at many points to carry assent. Dr. Watson is at odds with scholastic theologians, and hurls his lance against many false and hurtful religious notions which have somehow or other become imbedded in the popular Christian consciousness of past generations and of the generation that is now in middle or advanced life, but which we do not think have any large place in the thought of our younger Christian men and women. But, sympathizing with his endeavor to represent Christianity as a sane, reasonable, attractive and universal religion, we question whether he has not drawn a contrast between the parts of the New Testament too sharp and too unwarranted to stand the test of unprejudiced and thorough scholarship. It was not necessary to do this in order to emphasize his point. A vast religious public on both sides the sea has already swallowed eagerly, and with relish, in the Bonnie Brier Bush and The Days of Auld Lang Syne, most of the ideas of the Christian religion which constitute the staple thoughts of The Mind of the Master; but not until it lays hold of this later book will it realize just how much heresy it has absorbed through the shrewd observations of Drumsheugh, Hillocks, Burnbrae and others in that notable circle of Drumtochty wise men, as well as through the skillful portrayal of Lachlan Campbell's transformation and of Dr. Maclure's unselfish but unlabeled Christianity. At the same time The Mind of the Master is sure to prove one of the most influential and eventually one of the most helpful books of the year, for Christ's gospel is in it from cover to cover. [Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.50.]

BIBLICAL STUDY.

In the Modern Readers' Bible we have Deuteronomy. Professor Moulton takes occasion in his introduction to this battle-ground of the critics to call attention explicitly to the purely literary purpose of the whole series. His introduction is an explanation and appreciation not a criticism, and certainly no one after reading it can fail to share the editor's enthusiasm for the high literary quality of these farewell orations of Moses. The usefulness and value of this series is well shown in the skillful editing and helpful presentation of this particular book of the Bible. [Macmillan & Co. 50 cents.]

Volume V. of The Lutheran Commentary, edited by Henry Eyster Jacobs, contains Annotations on the Gospel According to St. John, by Prof. A. Spaeth, D. D., of the Lutheran Seminary, Philadelphia. The necessity of the case has compelled a somewhat more scholarly treatment of the material than in the previous volumes, and Professor Spaeth has handled the question of authorship somewhat at length. The commentary is helpful, and brief enough to be within the limits of lay study and busy lives. The style is simple and the spirit devotional. There is a useful synopsis of the gospel, the print is clear and the paper good. [Christian Literature Co. $2.00.]

BIOGRAPHY.

It seems to us clumsy editing which conceals under the title of The Way of Faith Illustrated such a book as the Autobiography of Hü Yong Mi. The way of faith may have illustrations of many sorts and from many quarters, but the story, in his own words, of a Chinese Christian who was a preacher, pastor, presiding elder and trusted adviser in the early years of the missions is a rarer and much more significant thing. The striking family group of the frontispiece prepares us to find an interesting story and we are not disappointed. Any one who wishes to make the acquaintance of a true and faithful Christian gentleman and to learn how real the trials and blessings of faith can be to a brother of foreign blood may have the opportunity in these pages. It is a merit that the narrative has been left in such a form as to be true to the original. We can see into the very heart of a godly man, and compare his impressions and "exercises" with those which are familiar to us in the journals of men of his type like Payson and Taylor in America. The book is of interest also as testimony to the Chinese view of religion, and especially as confirming the abundant testimony on the subject of the manifestation of evil spirits in China and their dread of Christ and Christians. [Eaton & Mains. $1.00.]

Twenty five Years a Parson in the Wild West, by Rev. John Brown. Mr. Brown has made a very readable book of autobiographical material, with vivid pictures of the West in earlier years, in an experience which extended from California to Texas. We wish he had dropped the mask of "Parson Ralph Riley" altogether, both because it suggests that there are some invented or exaggerated elements in the book, and because we think there would have been less temptation to the occasional indulgence in weak or aged witticisms and extravagance of diction in a strictly autobiographical narrative. The swift passing of the phase of national life depicted here makes every sincere narrative of personal participation in it of value, and Mr. Brown's book will have a place as material for history as well as because it is a readable narrative of frontier adventure and experience. [For sale by the Cong. S. S. & Pub. Soc. $1.00.]

STORIES.

The Quicksands of Pactolus, by Horace Annesley Vachell, contains an interesting picture of life in California which attracted much favorable notice when published serially in The Overland Monthly. Prominent San Francisco people are drawn in a manner easily recognizable, and the peculiarities of life in the far West are forcibly presented, nor is the moral of the perils to conscience and to love of the struggle for wealth omitted from the suggestions of the book. [Henry Holt & Co. $1.00.]

The Truth Tellers, by John Strange Winter, gives an amusing account of the trials of a London society woman who found herself sole guardian of her dead brother's five children. Having been brought up to tell "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," they proved exceedingly inconvenient members of the household, and their naïve and fearless remarks made them a terror to their aunt and many of her friends. The younger girls unwittingly interfere in the love affairs of the older sister, but straighten them out in the end, and the whole tale is bright and entertaining. [J. B. Lippincott Co. $1.00.]

A Venetian June, of course, means love-making, and Anna Fuller has told the story most charmingly, leaving just enough to be surmised at the end. Her previous successes in books with an American background have prepared us for the delicate character sketching and interesting study of life which are all the more attractive in picturesque Venice. [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.00.]

Scotch stories stand high in popular favor just at present, and readers will find The Starling, by Norman McLeod, full of quaint conversations and pathetic incidents. The strictness of old Scotch Presbyterianism is shown off in the way in which an earnest, God-fearing elder is cast out of office and shunned by the community simply because he will not kill his dead child's pet starling, which had been taught to utter a few harmless sentences. [Joseph Knight Co. 75 cents.]

Other volumes in the previously noticed series of Stories by English Authors are Africa, in which A. Conan Doyle and H. Rider Haggard are naturally at the front, and Italy, with James Payne's well-known story, A Faithful Retainer, followed by selections from Anthony Trollope, Laurence Oliphant, W. E. Norris and A. Mary F. Robinson. [Charles Scribner's Sons. 75 cents each.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

Echoes, by Howard J. Truman. This book has an unfortunate title. Verse is art original and masterful by strength or beauty, or it is nothing. Mr. Truman has underrated his verse, which shows no evidence of mere imitation though it nowhere rises to the hight of mastery which compels us to read and to remember. If it is worth while for him to write poetry at all he must remember that it is the most difficult and exacting of the arts, and will demand much more practice and self-dedication than he has given to these efforts, and even so he may fail to achieve permanent results, so rare is the ultimate gift of song. [J. B. Lippincott Co. $1.00.]

In the way of reprints we have Mark Twain's The Prince and the Pauper in the new and elegant edition of his works. [Harper & Bros. $1.75.]——From the same publishers comes Thomas Hardy's Wessex Tales, a number of short stories with an etching and map of the imaginative Wessex of the novelist's stories. [$1.50.]——The issue of the Christmas Stories completes the series of the works of Dickens published by the Macmillan Company. It is a complete edition in single volumes well printed on good paper and at a moderate price, and its publishers are to be congratulated on its rounded out success. [Macmillan & Co. 20 vols. $1.00 each.]

NOTES.

—— The August number of Scribner's is a short story number and is to have an elaborate cover in colors.

—— In the August McClure's Magazine Elizabeth Stuart Phelps has much of interest to tell about the best days of Boston as a literary center.

—— Mr. George W. Vanderbilt, says the Critic, has imported from Europe what is considered to be the most valuable library on forestry in the world for his Biltmore estate.

—— John Wesley Harper, who died last week, belonged to the second generation of the owners of the famous American publishing house. He was well known in literary and church circles in New York.

—— The Harvard University summer school is a success this year, having nearly 700 in attendance. Many of them are teachers and the courses are arranged with special reference to being helpful to their work.

—— The death of Charles Dickens—who signed himself "Charles Dickens the younger"—recalls the death of his distinguished father twenty-six years ago. The son was a man of business first and then an editor, and proved himself a friend of America, where he was welcome as a reader of scenes from his father's works.

—— The Burns centenary was celebrated in Boston by a largely attended meeting in Tremont Temple presided over by the governor of the commonwealth and addressed by Edward Everett Hale. No poet wins such spontaneous and widespread interest as the poet of the Cottar's Saturday Night, of Tam O' Shanter and of Mary Morrison.

—— The conclusion of a service of half a century in one parish is itself a rare and remarkable event, but when it is accompanied by the universal respect and love of a whole city it is worthy of even such a celebration and literary monument as was given to Rev. Sylvester Malone on the occasion of his fiftieth anniversary as pastor of the Roman Catholic parish of St. Peter and St. Paul in Brooklyn, N. Y., two years ago. The Brooklyn Eagle said of him at that time, "The fame he has and the love he holds are the best moral possession which the Catholic Church has in this diocese." The memorial volume, a copy of which we hereby acknowledge with thanks and which we have read with pleasure, is a fitting monument of an occasion in which all the notable people of the city, Protestant as well as Roman Catholic, were glad to have a part.

Rev. Alexander McKenzie, D. D., President; George Gould, Treasurer.

PASSING COMMENT ON THIS WEEK'S NEWS.

The flexibility of Congregationalism as to what it considers non-essential is illustrated by a baptismal service described in our New York letter in which three distinct forms of administering the sacrament were used. Welcome, then, homeopathists, allopathists and hydropathists as well! Our denominational arms are open wide enough to embrace you all.

It is a matter of pleasure to us that we can present the likeness of one whose long life has been so loyally spent in the ranks of Congregationalism. Over fifty years in the pulpit is a record which cannot be claimed by more than five or six of our Massachusetts ministers in service today.

Those adherents in Connecticut are just as welcome as members of our churches by choice as if they had become so by birth. Whatever law they are bound by in their own land can hardly be supposed to direct them here.

A suggestion for increasing the attendance at church services is found in a New Hampshire item, and is well worth consideration and imitation in other country places.

The six years' record of that Indiana pastor and people whose neat edifice is pictured herewith would do honor to a much longer period of activity.

Lowell ought soon to see an improvement in its Sunday keeping. Such united action to that end should avail much.

Several large individual subscriptions noted this week encourage the recipient churches in different sections of the country.

THE CROWNING SUCCESS OF SIX YEARS.

It is an occasion of gratitude to God when, in a growing Western city, a church of the Pilgrim idea develops—one which is spiritual in tone, evangelistic and aggressive in purpose and method, and which exhibits a strong tendency to make itself felt in civic and social reforms. These qualities mark the life of Plymouth Congregational Church, Fort Wayne, Ind., to an unusual degree.

A largely attended reception was given by the church, July 13, on the sixth anniversary of the present pastorate and the fifteenth of the ministry of Rev. J. S. Ainslie. During these years pastor and people have labored with faith, zeal and harmony. The large success which has attended their united efforts has been an inspiration in the denominational life in the State.

FORT WAYNE CHURCH, INDIANA.

In 1890 seventy resident Congregationalists were united in covenant, with the only property, a small frame building, standing upon a leased lot in a non-central location, and afterwards selling for $800. Through the efforts of the C. H. M. S., Mr. Ainslie was called to the difficult task of leadership. After five years the church became self-supporting, having in the meantime secured a central property, erected at a cost of $30,000, largely paid for. The present membership is 400, showing an average annual net increase of fifty-five; 245 have come upon confession. The large proportion of men is unusual and significant, the present male membership exceeding that of any Congregational church in Indiana. A second church has also been organized and conveniently housed in the south part of the city.

The homelike and inviting church edifice occupies the corner of Jefferson and Harrison Streets. It is spacious and arranged for the varied uses of a modern edifice. It seats 600 persons, and the capacity can be doubled by throwing open the adjoining spaces. It is an embodiment of the spirit of usefulness rather than that of display.

It goes without saying that Mr. Ainslie is a pastor of executive and pulpit ability. He is not yet forty years old, and is a man of energy and is always armed with a well-defined program. His previous career, after graduating at Cornell and studying at Yale, was a pastorate of nine years with a successful Congregational enterprise at Ogdensburg, N. Y. He contributes liberally from his own salary to advance every church department. He presents from the pulpit the work of each of our national benevolent societies and solicits special contributions. The benevolences have risen to $480 the past year. A Union Missionary Society, composed of both sexes, is active and efficient.

Meanwhile the social and institutional features of the open church are being developed. Kindergarten and Chautauqua work and the various societies for young people are in active progress. "We need," says Mr. Ainslie, "a better applied Christianity. Its social aspects must come to the front. We must sharply define and enforce our duties to our fellowmen. The Golden Rule must be translated into business conduct. We need to have religion applied to the needs of the age, not new doctrine but better methods, seeking the transformation of society and its reorganization upon Christian ideals."

Fort Wayne is a city of consequence in northern Indiana. The population is 40,000. It is delightfully situated on the Maumee River and its affluents. Historically it was "Kekionga" of the French occupation and "Fort Miamis" of the later English occupation. General Wayne, in his victorious contest of a century ago, left his name in evidence. Since the early mixed settlement of French and Indians the Catholic Church has dominated a large portion of the population. Later immigration established a strong center of high church Lutheranism. It is the seat of Concordia Seminary, and is a city of costly and ornate Catholic and Lutheran churches. The H. M. S. sent Rev. C. E. Furnam there in 1829, and in 1831 his successor, Rev. James Chute, organized the First Church (Presbyterian). In 1844 Henry Ward Beecher, then of Indianapolis, went on horseback to Fort Wayne and assisted in starting the second church, which was of the "new school." Rev. Charles Beecher was its first pastor. In 1870 Plymouth had its small beginning, a portion of its twenty-five members withdrawing from the second church (Presbyterian). Conditions averse to Congregationalism conspired to make the progress of the work slow for two decades. But faith and self-sacrifice conquered, and good foundations were laid in those early years.

The church was beautifully decorated for the reception, and the refreshments were ample in the dining-room. The Ladies' Aid Society did splendid service in this as on all other occasions. An orchestra furnished music. The last address was by the pastor and fitly closed the exercises. E. D. C.

HONORS WELL WON AND WELL WORN.

To have reached the eightieth milestone in life's journey with mental and physical powers unabated, and to have served not only faithfully and successfully, but brilliantly, as a preacher of the Word for fifty-one consecutive years, is a record rarely attained, and, when found, deserves more than a passing notice. Such a life is that of Rev. Daniel March, D.D., pastor emeritus of the First Church of Woburn, Mass., which was founded in 1642, and of which Rev. Doremus Scudder is pastor.

The recent celebration by this venerable society of the eightieth anniversary of Dr. March's natal day—an occasion in which all denominations and the city itself joined—suggests placing on record the more salient features of his exceptionally long life and term of pastoral service. He was born in the town of Millbury, Mass., July 21, 1816. The public schools and the local academy furnished his preparatory education; then he entered Yale College and was graduated in 1840. After a period of service as a teacher he was ordained to his first pastorate in Cheshire, Ct., in 1845. He was afterwards settled in Nashua, N. H., and Brooklyn, N. Y. In 1856 he was called to the Woburn church and remained there for six years. Then followed fourteen years of pastoral work in Philadelphia. In 1876 he returned to Woburn and supplied his former pulpit until 1879, when he was again installed over the church and has since remained with it. In each of these fields of labor his work has been singularly blessed. One year ago the rank of pastor emeritus was conferred upon him. That more than half of his ministry has been in Woburn eliminated any denominational aspect from the celebration.

The occasion was a generous outpouring of affection from a loving people and a grateful and appreciative community, and voiced the deep-seated and sincere esteem in which this talented preacher, this earnest Christian man and model citizen is held by those who have felt the impress of his teachings, buttressed, as they have ever been, by a consistent Christian life. More than a thousand friends gathered to greet him, the great auditorium of the church was bright with foliage and blossoms, music lent its harmony, and oratory—civic, official and clerical—wove its garland of congratulatory and well-deserved praise, while a troop of eighty children, rose-laden their faces all aglow with love for their spiritual father, deposited before him their tribute of pure white blossoms.

Dr. March is to be congratulated upon his sustained vitality and his extended life of usefulness, and the church at Woburn receives felicitations as well, upon its good fortune in retaining, for so many years, the great ability and potent influence for good that marks the character of its pastor emeritus. In this good fortune Woburn must admit as sharing partners the Congregational brotherhood all over the land, for Dr. March is a wide-horizoned man. Not only has he performed in a masterly manner the arduous and ever-widening duties of the pastorate, but he has found time for extensive travels in the Holy Land and the mission world, and his numerous books preserve for us in a charmingly clear and graphic style his keen observations and intelligent impressions. While we rejoice with Woburn in its fortunate possession, in a still larger and wider sense we congratulate the church universal and the world of Christian men and women, for we recognize their indebtedness to this holy man, and feel grateful for the fruitage of these well-filled, well-lived fourscore years, rich in their example of simple faith and gentle dignity.

ALL AROUND NEW YORK STATE.

All who are familiar with the history of Plymouth Church, Rochester, for the past twenty years will feel a deep interest in the recently begun pastorate of Rev. W. F. Kettle, succeeding Rev. Myron Adams who died at the close of last year. Mr. Kettle supplied the church at the time of the meeting of the National Council at Syracuse, to which he was a delegate, and was surprised to receive in a short time a hearty invitation to permanent charge. The work begun Jan. 1, 1896, progresses most happily. Under the ordinary ministrations the congregations have steadily increased and fourteen have been added to the church. A strong C. E. Society has been set in operation, a men's Sunday evening league and a bicycle club, for which sheds have been arranged. Children's Day and Easter Sunday were appropriately observed. In addition to its offerings for local charities the church has remembered the American Board, the American Missionary Association and the Sunday School and Publishing Society, and, after being practically disconnected with the denomination for many years, has been represented at local associations and at the State association, which it has invited for 1897. Among other gratifying signs of its restoration to former relations many of the prominent pastors in other denominations have exchanged with Mr. Kettle, in recognition of the new order of things. Plymouth of Rochester was once among the strategic points of our denomination in the State and the former prestige and helpfulness may yet be recovered. Mr. Kettle has been but eleven years in the ministry and came to this charge from Elburn, Ill.

The Poughkeepsie church is greatly enjoying the services of Rev. W. H. Hopkins, who was settled among them about nine months ago, succeeding Rev. Wayland Spaulding. Mr. Hopkins is a graduate of the University of Vermont and of Union Seminary. After preaching for a while at Woodbridge, N. J., he was obliged to go to Florida on account of his wife's health, where he served a Presbyterian church in Jacksonville. His custom is to speak entirely without notes, but from carefully prepared materials. He has a five-minute talk for the children at the morning service and is in all the movements among the young people. It is specially gratifying that this strong church, after the many years of Mr. Spaulding's able pastorate, should be united and happy in the new relations.

From the Hudson River it is a far cry to Jamestown on the extreme western borders, close to the Ohio line. With the new year there came to the First Church there Rev. A. L. Smalley, from the Pilgrim Church of Chicago. He is not a stranger to the State. About ten years ago he left the ministry of the Methodist Church to take charge of Pilgrim Church of Buffalo, thence going to Ottumwa, Ill., and thence to Chicago. In addition to the ordinary preparation for his life work he studied in the law department at Ann Arbor and has made several trips abroad. He has remarkable gifts as a public speaker, being rather quiet, with evidence of reserved powers, speaking without notes in a crisp, clear style. While a progressive orthodox man he is in no degree sensational and he enters heartily into local, especially educational, interests.

One of the oldest and strongest churches in the State is that at Norwich, where for five years Rev. W. H. Scudder has been the pastor. His departure for Tacoma leaves a large vacancy. He possesses the untiring earnestness and versatility of his race and has been a leader among our pastors in his section of New York. From 600 to 800 calls a year have kept him in close touch with the firesides of the people, who feel deeply attached to him and regret his departure. The terrible calamity by which, about a year ago, his home was burned and two lovely children were victims to the flames has created a bond of unusual tenderness between himself and the people of the community. Mrs. Scudder has made herself felt in all the work and will be missed by the women of the churches of New York in their missionary organizations. Under this pastorate the Blakeslee system of Sunday school lessons and the Harper courses of Bible reading have been adopted and the Young Mens' Club and the Endeavor Societies have flourished. The Tacoma church and the young State of Washington are to be felicitated upon securing so efficient and hearty a worker as now goes to them.

Essex County is an immense mountainous region where our eleven churches, far between, keep the watch-fires burning in sight of one another. At the recent meeting of the association at old Ticonderoga all the ministers of the association were present and a plan was adopted of holding bi-monthly ministerial meetings resembling those held in Massachusetts. The theme of the meeting was Greater Fellowship among the Churches and Denominational Loyalty. Among recently established pastorates are those of Rev. G. C. Demott of Ticonderoga, Rev. P. N. Moore of Willsboro and Rev. Edward J. Abbott of Wadhams Mills. With the month of July Rev. H. G. Depfer and Rev. Henry Lewis begin work at Moriah and Schroon Lake, respectively. The Ticonderoga church enjoys the active help of Mr. and Mrs Joseph Cook during the six months of their residence there, Mr. Cook lecturing occasionally for the benefit of the church and Mrs. Cook being the president of the women's missionary organization. Mr. Demott is a recent graduate of Bowdoin College and Bangor Seminary and is now in his first charge, which he assumed in October, 1894, since which time sixty-four have been added to the church. Mr. Lewis of Schroon Lake is a recent graduate from the University of New York and of Union Seminary and has been a member of Dr. Virgin's church.

Thus our rural churches are being ably manned, and but few fields in the State are without some pastoral care. Much of the work of the State Home Missionary Society has been given to restoring waste places and pleasant paths to dwell in. One of the most striking of these resurrections is at Lincklaen, Chenango County, where early in the century a Congregational church was established, which flourished for a long time and somewhere in the thirties, like a multitude of others, passed under the control of the presbytery. In 1859 it was reorganized on the original pattern, and about that time the brothers, Lucien and Dever Warner of New York, were members of it. In 1883, there having been many removals and deaths, services were discontinued and the Methodists took the field. About a year ago Secretary Curtis passing through the town saw the old church deserted, and learned that a few Congregationalists still remained who might enjoy occasional services. A student who was supplying at North Pitcher, several miles off, began Sunday afternoon meetings, which were greatly enjoyed and aroused a new interest in Christian work.

After a few months, in March of this year, a singular thing occurred in ecclesiastical history. The Methodist minister proposed a popular vote by the citizens as to their preference in denominations, the result showing that fifty-four voted for a Congregational, twenty-one for a Baptist and one for a Methodist organization. At this juncture our pastor at Pitcher, Rev. D. W. Bull, on request of the people, held two weeks continuous evangelistic meetings, and on May 17 the ancient "First Congregational Church of Lincklaen" was revived, twenty-six members uniting, fourteen from the old churches and twelve on confession of faith. Rev. Lemuel Jones assisted in the reorganization and received several between the ages of seventy and eighty-two. To show how we can adapt ourselves to circumstances he baptized seven by immersion in a brook, six by sprinkling and one by "pouring." A constitution suitable to the case and the original articles of faith were adopted and now the old building is to be renewed or another structure erected.

Nestled in the heart of the lovely Honeoye Valley, south of the city of Rochester, is the town of the same name, Honeoye, where for thirty-four years there has been but one Congregational pastor, Rev. S. M. Day, who now lays down his work to enjoy a well-earned rest among his own people. The story of his pastorate deserves a much larger setting than my limits allow, for it is a most interesting object lesson in the cumulative power of a faithful country pastorate. Just where many are weakest Mr. Day has shown his power. He was a native and to the manner born, his father having been pastor in the same township for twelve years. His personal characteristics entered very largely into the rich fruitfulness of the prolonged ministry, while the church itself and the community made their own large contribution to the result. In 1862 when he began, Honeoye, a place of 1,600 people, had six churches, all small and poor, his own numbering but sixteen names. But tact, love, patience, godliness and the simplicity of Christ won their way, as they always must, and in time four other denominations melted into the little church under Mr. Day, and there was harmony and strength in place of weakness. A powerful revival in 1887 brought in a large number, and last April forty-one more were added during a similar blessing. Throughout the years of this fragrant ministry Mr. Day has been one of the youngest of the church, the Sunday school has been a powerful factor in town evangelization and all the organizations of young people have found their place sooner or later in the church. Mr. Day has officiated at 260 weddings and 528 funerals in his ministry, reaching far beyond the limits of his church.

The death of Herbert M. Dixon, on the 26th ult., removes from the State one of our best loved and most efficient workers, widely known in various lines of Christian activity. In his home church in Smyrna he was almost everything, and had maintained a neighborhood Sunday school for forty-four years. He was in the county Bible Society, the district Sunday School Association, and in the State and national home missionary societies as a trustee. The business firm to which he belonged, at one time, did a large wholesale business. Recent financial troubles led to Mr. Dixon's retirement from it and a rapid decline in body and mind, to which death was a happy release. At his funeral a great concourse attended, and tributes to his excellencies were many and heartfelt. He leaves a widow and two sons, who are connected with the School for Christian Workers at Springfield.

CONFERENCES AND ASSOCIATIONS.

ALA.—Echo District Conference held its annual meeting with Bascom Church, Wicksburg, July 10-12. Sermons were preached by Rev. Messrs. Bassett, Mathison, Butram and Pharr. Topics were: Church Benevolence, Missions, Pastoral Visitation, Church Literature and Sunday schools. During the last year there has been an increase in the number of pupils and amount of money collected for Sunday school work. The next meeting will be held at Blackwood.

CLUBS.

VT.—The Passumpsic Club held its midsummer meeting at Willoughby Lake, July 20. About 40 persons were at dinner. A trip by steamer to Westmore preceded the greetings given by Dr. A. H. Heath, the president, and other addresses. The topics were: A Historical Review, The Club, The Congregational Bond, The Voice of the Press, The Voice from the North, Armenia's Needs.

NEW ENGLAND.

Massachusetts.

DEDHAM.—First. The supplies for August are: 2, Rev. Edward Benner of Wellesley; 9, Rev. H. E. Barnes, North Andover; 16, Rev. C. M. Southgate, Auburndale; 23, Rev. C. F. Weeden, Norwood; 30, Rev. C. L. Jackson, Roxbury. The pastor, Rev. J. B. Seabury, will be at Waterville, N. H., with his family.

SALEM.—Crombie Street and South unite for services during the vacation, each pastor supplying one-half the time in his own church.——Dr. J. L. Hill supplies the First Presbyterian Church, St. Louis, during the month of August. He and Mrs. Hill have just returned from the Washington convention.

SOUTH HAMILTON.—A union church of 17 members was organized July 12. Rev. D. W. S. Clark of Salem preached the sermon and Rev. J. G. Nichols of Hamilton offered the prayer. Representative clergymen of the Baptist, Methodist and Episcopal denominations extended hearty greetings. Mr. Johnson, a recent graduate of the Boston University, is supplying the pulpit. The enterprise promises well for growth and influence in a community fast increasing and midway between the Wenham and Hamilton churches and the Asbury camp ground.

HAVERHILL.—North has invited Mr. Arthur S. Burrill of Andover Seminary to labor one year with it as assistant pastor. He has accepted and is at work. Mr. Burrill is a graduate of Phillips Exeter Academy, Amherst College and Andover Seminary, and has been a friend to the pastor, Rev. G. H. Reed, for 15 years. There is every reason to hope that this strong church will accomplish more than ever by this accession to its working force.

GROVELAND.—Owing to his aggressive efforts in leading an association of citizens in a movement to restore quiet and order at "The Pines," a popular summer resort near this village, Rev. L. F. Berry was recently brought into somewhat unpleasant prominence by his antagonists, who hung him in effigy. The success of the aggressive movement of the citizens in the cause of proper Sabbath observance in the locality resulted in six convictions and the imposition of fines. Mr. Berry's energetic work during his several years of service in this church has led his people to place confidence in him.

LOWELL.—Rev. J. M. Greene is chairman of a committee, on which nine denominations, including the Catholics, are represented, to see what steps can be taken to abate the desecration of Sunday. ——Rev. Messrs. C. W. Huntington, C. L. Merriam and G. F. Kenngott started for different resorts in Maine on Monday last; Rev. W. D. Leland had already gone.——Rev. C. L. Merriam was one of the lecturers at the New England Chautauqua on Children's Day; he illustrated his lecture by crayon drawings.——Rev. G. H. Johnson had charge of the daily Biblical hour at the Connecticut Valley Chautauqua at Northampton, the course of study being from the Old Testament and participated in by a large number.

FITCHBURG.—Rev. John Wood, the oldest clergyman of the city, passed his 87th birthday June 24. He graduated from Amherst in 1836, and from the Theological Institute of Connecticut in 1839. He has held pastorates in many New England parishes. Mr. Wood's ancestry is closely identified with revolutionary history, and his clear memory aids him in recalling many anecdotes told by his father and grandfather.

NEW BEDFORD.—Trinitarian. The monthly Messenger has just completed its third year under the successful management of the Trinitarian Church Club. Its pages are full of excellent original work, church news, general denominational items and helpful editorial paragraphs. The pastor's column, under the supervision of Rev. M. C. Julien, contains much of suggestiveness to the readers. Altogether the paper may be heartily congratulated on its neat and strong appearance.

WORCESTER.—Park. While Rev. I. L. Willcox is absent attending the Northfield Conference Dr. G. H. Gould and Rev. R. M. Taft will supply the pulpit Aug. 9 and 16.—— Hope. The Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip take charge of the midweek prayer meeting during the pastor's vacation.—— Pilgrim. The Men's Association held its annual excursion July 21. This has become a regular feature of the association and many outside the church take advantage of the favorable opportunity to visit Newport, Crescent Beach and Block Island.

AUBURN.—The ancient church edifice was destroyed by fire some months ago and the plans for rebuilding have now assumed a definite form and the contract has been awarded. The new house will be of wood and the auditorium, lecture-room and ladies' parlor will be on the first floor, the dining hall and kitchen being in the basement. The building, with its foundations, will cost about $8,000. Nearly enough money has been subscribed to provide for the work. In the old building the town hall was in the basement of the structure, and that was where the fire originated, but a new town hall is now being erected. The pastor, Rev. C. M. Pierce, and his people are full of encouragement in their work.

WARREN.—Through the summer months successful meetings of the church and Y. P. S. C. E. are being held on Sunday evening. An intermediate department has been formed in the Sunday school. The Sunday school has appropriated $50 for a share in the Jubilee Fund of the A. M. A. The pastor, Rev. H. G. Hale, left July 20 for a four weeks' vacation.

DANA.—The church is supplied on Sunday afternoons by Rev. Harlan Page of Hardwick, where he has preached at this time in connection with his own pastorate for about three years.

EASTON.—This church, Rev. A. H. Fuller, pastor, rejoices in the payment of its debt of many years' standing. A gift of $400 from Mrs. John Kimball and $100 from an anonymous source stimulated the people to a completion of the effort to wipe out all indebtedness.

Maine.

ELIOT.—The church of this place, which improved its meeting house to the amount of $225 last winter, has recently had the gift of a fine new carpet for the main auditorium, Mrs. William Hill being the donor. Through the efforts of Mrs. James Coleman and others the woodwork of the interior has also been painted. The church is now beautiful and well equipped. During last month three of the most promising young people became Christians. The pastor, Rev. A. L. Golder, goes this week to his old home and the Rangely Lakes for an outing.

NORWAY.—This church is in a thickly settled farming community which is interested in Christian work and ready to assist the pastor in his plans. All departments are more prosperous than ever before, under the care of Rev. B. S. Rideout, who has been in charge nine years. The building is in fine condition, after repairs and repainting of the exterior and frescoing and a new pulpit set for the interior.

GORHAM.—The society has decided to erect a chapel costing $16,000 on the lot south of the church. Ex-Governor Robie has increased his subscription from $1,000 to $1,500 and $8,000 is now pledged. The building material will be brick and stone.

BANGOR.—First and Central unite as usual in summer services. Rev. J. S. Penman is visiting New York with his family. Rev. H. L. Griffin and wife are spending the vacation at Cape Breto Island.

ALFRED.—The work of this church, Rev. R. C. Drisco, pastor, is prospering in all departments The edifice has been recently repaired and repainted —an outward sign of prosperity.

MADISON.—The new pastor, Rev. F. A. Fuller, has assumed charge of the work and is located in the parsonage.

New Hampshire.

NORTHWOOD CENTER.—Under the lead of the new pastor, who began labor in June, the regular church work has assumed new proportions and interest. A Ladies' Aid Society has been organized for the better promotion of certain departments. To increase attendance on the church service one worthy member of the parish living two miles distant runs a regular Sunday omnibus, to carry people who would not, or could not, otherwise go, and some have already availed themselves of the privilege. This is an example which might be imitated in many of our country towns.

HAVERHILL.—The Young Men's Club during July and August have charge of the Sunday evening service, the program including singing mainly by a male quartet as an attractive and popular feature. The pastor, Rev. C. L. Skinner, also selects for the themes of his discourses topics well calculated to please and profit the young people. By the use of special endeavors to induce them to be present, in connection with song and sermon, the attendance has been greatly increased, it is hoped, permanently for the good of all.

ACWORTH.—The recent death of Judge Dickey has inflicted on the church and community an irreparable loss. Steadfastly faithful in his gift of service, and interested in the promotion of the temporal and spiritual welfare of the town, he won for himself a reputation for eminent and consecrated abilities and a high Christian character. His place will not soon be filled, but his influence for good will long remain and his name be held in loving remembrance.

EXETER.—Second. The idea which was early entertained of moving the old church building to some locality in the growing suburbs, to be used as occasion might require for religious purposes, has been abandoned, and the structure will be taken down to make room for the new edifice, and the material sold at auction—a consummation which is more or less regretted, considering the excellent condition of the edifice.

NEWPORT.—The audience-room of the church is newly lighted with 90 incandescent lamps. On the evening of July 19, when the electric current was first turned on, a congregation of nearly 300 persons was present and listened to echoes from Washington and a stirring address by Rev. G. H. Gutterson of the A. M. A.

FARMINGTON.—Rev. R. M. Sargent of St. Louis, who supplied the church here in 1850-51, while a student at Andover Seminary, and was pastor 1860-69, is spending the summer in the village, reviving acquaintance with those of his former parishioners who still survive.

LOUDON.—During a thunder shower, July 15, the spire of the church was struck by lightning and set on fire. Happily, however, the flames were soon extinguished and the damage, which proved slight, is fully covered by insurance.

Vermont.

LYNDONVILLE.—The addition to the meeting house to be furnished as a church parlor is progressing well. Many of the women have offered to give articles of furniture and decoration for the interior.

Rhode Island.

PROVIDENCE.—Academy Avenue joined with the Baptist, Episcopal and Methodist churches in its neighborhood in a union excursion July 10. A steamboat carried 750 passengers down Narragansett Bay to Rocky Point, where a stay of several hours was made for dinner and recreation. In the afternoon a long sail was taken to Fort Adams in Newport harbor, where the Government fortifications were seen and field sports enjoyed. The churches improved the rare opportunity for mutual fellowship.

Connecticut.

PLANTSVILLE.—Rev. F. T. Rouse will take his vacation during August at South Freeport, Me. The first two Sundays the pulpit will be supplied, there being no service the last two. During his absence the meeting house will be thoroughly renovated and new carpets laid. In response to an appeal to the members of the church recently to clear off the debt of the society nearly $600 were subscribed a week ago Sunday, a large portion of which was paid in. This leaves a balance of about $500 to be canceled.

NEW BRITAIN.—First. Dr. G. H. Sandwell, who had planned to go to Europe last week, was compelled to sell his steamer ticket and delay his departure until this week on account of the sudden illness of his wife. She is much better now however. Dr. Sandwell will be gone about six weeks.

NORWICH.—Dr. Lewellyn Pratt of the Broadway Church and Rev. C. W. Morrow of the Second Church leave on their vacations this week, returning the first week in September. During their absence union services will be held alternately by the two churches, supplied by visiting clergymen.

WILLIMANTIC.—The union open-air meetings of the Congregational and Episcopal churches at six o'clock Sunday evenings are becoming quite popular, several hundred persons being in attendance at each service. They are held on the lawn just east of the Congregational meeting house.

OLD SAYBROOK.—A syndicate of prominent citizens has been formed for the purpose of publishing in permanent form the papers read at the recent quadrimillennial anniversary celebration of the founding of the church. The work will cost about $200.

EASTON.—The painting and redecoration of the interior of the meeting house has been begun and will be pushed rapidly. The auditorium can hardly be used for several weeks. After the decorations are finished new carpets will be laid.

SIMSBURY.—Amos R. Eno, Esq., the owner of the Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York, has given $6,000 to the church here, Rev. C. E. Stowe, pastor, and a like sum to the Simsbury Cemetery Association, both gifts being unconditional.

COLUMBIA.—The holding of Sunday evening services is an innovation, but that they are appreciated is attested by the large attendance at each service so far. Rev. J. P. Harvey is the recently installed pastor.

NEW HAVEN.—Dwight Place. The evening services are suspended until September.—Rev. D. M. James was called to the deathbed of his mother at Kane, Pa., last week. His family have since joined him and will remain there for a time.

BRIDGEPORT.—Park Street. Rev. E. G. Fullerton has received the degree of Ph. D.—West End. Rev. C. F. Stimson has so far recovered from his recent illness as to be able to occupy his pulpit once more.

BRIDGEWATER.—The improvements on the interior of the edifice are progressing rapidly and it is now expected that the auditorium will be ready for use in about three weeks. The improvements are extensive and were much needed.

WATERBURY.—First. The pastor will be absent on his vacation about six weeks. During his absence the meeting house will be closed and extensive repairs will be made on the organ.

EAST CANAAN.—Rev. Mr. Hunter, formerly pastor of this church but more recently of Paris, France, is spending the summer in this place visiting old friends.

DANIELSON.—The pastor, Rev. H. S. Brown, is giving a series of lectures on the recent Endeavor convention at Washington in his own and neighboring churches. He uses the stereopticon.

FALLS VILLAGE.—The bell tower is nearly completed. With the 2,100 pound bell it is the gift of the late Albert D. Hood. New seats are to be put in and a parsonage is to be erected soon.

LEBANON.—Union services of the two churches are being held with the Congregationalists all this month. During August the two congregations will unite in the other house.

SOUTH WINDSOR.—The Baptist brethren are uniting with the Congregationalists during the vacation of their pastor. Upon his return union services will be held in the Baptist edifice.

There are 15 Swedish Congregational churches in this State, with a total membership of over 900. Swedish subjects are by birth and baptism members of the Lutheran Church and by law compelled to support it. However, there are over 400 Swedish mission churches in the country established on the basis of the Congregational and other like polities and having a membership of over 100,000 communicants.

MIDDLE STATES.

New York.

NEW YORK.—Pilgrim. During a severe thunder storm, last week Wednesday, the meeting house tower was struck twice by lightning, causing damage of about $800, fortunately confined to the exterior only. The chief injury was to the slating, windows and decorative work on the tower.

Broadway Tabernacle is closed for the present, owing to the work of painting its walls, which is in progress. Not until Sept. 1 will the decoration be finished. New furnaces will also be put in, the whole cost of this addition and the painting being $3,000.

BROOKLYN.—Lee Avenue. The rumor that this church was to consolidate with the New England is contradicted as entirely without foundation. Neither is there basis for the report that the pastor, Rev. J. B. Clark, would resign to accept a professorship at Amherst. No such offer has come from Amherst. Mr. Clark's condition as a consequence of a bicycle accident within a few weeks is continually improving.

HOMER.—The meeting house is closed for repairs and redecorating of the interior. Rev. F. A. S. Storer and wife are at the Thousand Islands.

Pennsylvania.

PHILADELPHIA.—Snyder Avenue independent Presbyterian mission voted unanimously, July 15, to organize as a Congregational church. It also called F. F. Wiedes, a member of the German Reformed Church, as its pastor and appointed a committee to arrange a council of recognition. The neighborhood is growing fast and the prospect for earnest Christian work is good.

THE SOUTH.

District of Columbia.

WASHINGTON.—Mt. Pleasant. The ground breaking for the new edifice took place July 9. An interesting program was furnished, Rev. M. R. Fishburn presiding and making the introductory remarks. Addresses were also made by Rev. S. M. Newman, D. D., of the First Church, representing Local Congregationalism, Rev. J. L. Hill, D.D., of Salem, Mass., representing National Congregationalism, and Rev. W. H. Towers, D. D., of Manchester, Eng., upon International Congregationalism. Rev. F. E. Clark, D. D., president of the Society of Christian Endeavor, removed the first shovelful of earth, and was followed by the pastor, former pastor, speakers and officers of the church and society.

THE INTERIOR.

Ohio.

CLEVELAND.—Pilgrim numbered 728 members July 5, a gain of nearly 100 since Jan. 1.—Trinity has increased from 267 to 331 during the same period.

Illinois.

CHICAGO.—Washington Park. The first payment for lots for the new building has been made and the subscription list for the structure is increasing.—Covenant is also raising funds for a new house, with $5,000 already at hand. At least three times this amount will be required.—Central Park has spent over $5,000 the past year in fitting up its basement for Sunday school purposes.

Indiana.

CENTRAL.—The work here and at Beechwood and Cedarwood is prospering under the energetic leadership of Rev. E. W. Murray and wife. It is a needy country field. The timber for a new parsonage has been secured. The pastor assisted in securing it. It is hoped to complete the work without outside help or asking a loan of the Church Building Society.

Michigan.

KALAMAZOO.—First. The resignation of the pastor, Rev. T. E. Barr, has been accepted. His letter of withdrawal from the pastorate clearly states the reason of his departure as his unwillingness to resist the policy which a certain faction of the church has pursued for a long time. He has been here about two years and a half.

PONTIAC.—The church has passed its 65th anniversary, which was appropriately observed of late. The last 12 months were reported as the most prosperous of the entire period of the existence of the church. Rev. B. F. Aldrich is pastor.

AUGUSTA.—The meeting house has been thoroughly repaired, a new roof, and new paper and paint in the audience-room adding greatly to the comfort and beauty of the building. The work has succeeded well and looks encouraging for the future.

Wisconsin.

LANCASTER.—The parsonage has been well renovated through the efforts of the Ladies' Aid Society. The church is prosperous and is already yielding a harvest to the new pastor, Rev. T. J. Brown, as a result of his own and the activity of the former pastor, Rev. P. H. Mason. The evening congregations are nearly equal to those of the morning.

RHINELANDER.—Rev. J. H. Chandler, the pastor, takes for the first time in three years a month's vacation. The wiping out of a building debt of $2,800, by a subscription of $1,800 and a pledge from the Ladies' Aid Society for the remainder, has brought joy to the church.

THE WEST.

Missouri.

ST. LOUIS.—First is holding union services Sunday evenings in connection with the Grand Avenue Presbyterian and Lucas Avenue Cumberland Presbyterian Churches.—Central has united with the First United Presbyterian and Delmar Avenue Baptist Churches in the Sunday evening service, using the three edifices in turn.

WEBSTER GROVES.—Rev. J. W. Sutherland, D. D., will spend his vacation in the Ozark Mountains. The plan for the outing includes a wagon trip, with gun and rod, across the State of Arkansas.

Iowa.

ATLANTIC.—Rev. E. S. Hill, July 12, reviewed his experience of Thirty Years in the Ministry in One Neighborhood. In spite of extreme heat the auditorium was crowded with members and friends, many of them old settlers in the neighborhood. The beautiful decorations were arranged by the C. E. Society.

MANCHESTER.—On his return, July 12, after three months' visit in New York, Rev. H. W. Tuttle was greeted with a full house. During his absence services were continued, Rev. J. G. Miller preaching a part of the time and members of the church conducting other meetings.

SIOUX CITY.—About 1,000 conversions have been reported in connection with the Williams meetings. At the closing service 5,000 persons attended. Mr. Williams will soon commence another series of meetings at Marshalltown.

BLAIRSBURG.—The contract has been let for a new $3,000 edifice, to be completed by the middle of October. Rev. A. W. Moore is pastor.

Minnesota.

SAUK RAPIDS.—This church, with Cable, has been pastorless for several months. A call to Rev. H. H. Appleman was declined, but he has finally decided to accept. A subscription has been raised, and it is hoped that the work will be reorganized and the Sunday school reopened at Cable.

STEWARTVILLE.—The church has had some trouble with its finances, and was in danger of losing its pastor, Rev. R. G. Jones, who resigned. He was earnestly asked to reconsider his decision, his salary was raised and he has consented to remain. Congregations have largely increased.

ST. PAUL.—Plymouth will be supplied for two Sundays during the pastor's vacation by Rev. J. L. Nott, formerly of Union Church, Minneapolis.—Park. Pres. J. W. Strong of Carleton College is supplying for a few Sundays for Dr. E. P. Ingersoll.

Rev. Messrs. W. M. Brooks, D. D., of Tabor College and E. S. Hill, D. D., of Atlantic, Io., are spending their vacations in Minneapolis.

Kansas.

RUSSELL.—This church is to be supplied for a few months, beginning July 19, by Rev. H. N. Pringle of Anoka, Minn. Mr. Pringle is already favorably known in the State, having spent a summer, while a seminary student, as pastor at Linwood.

ANTHONY.—While the spiritual outlook is hopeful, the church is suffering from removals caused by crop failure and business depression. Sixty regular attendants have removed from the town within the last 18 months.

ALTON.—The summer work of the pastor, Mr. T. E. Roberts, extends over a wide territory and is prospering. At a recent meeting of the Northwestern Congregational Club the pastor read an essay on Fellowship.

LITTLE RIVER.—Rev. C. T. Young is in poor health and has gone to Colorado for rest and recuperation. He is highly esteemed by his people, who have shown their devotion during his protracted illness.

ATCHISON.—The last service in the old meeting house, held July 14, was an occasion of rare interest. Dr. Richard Cordley delivered the address. Work on the new building will be begun at once.

WICHITA.—Fairmount. The church has gained in membership during the stay of Rev. A. A. Brower, the assistant pastor, who has just resigned. One great need is a house of worship.

MOUND CITY.—Mr. A. E. Johnson of Yale Seminary is spending the summer with this church and reports encouraging signs in his work.

Rev. R. D. Parker, one of the veteran home missionaries in the State, has recently sustained a surgical operation at Christ Hospital, Topeka. He has returned to Manhattan, and is reported comfortable though weak. It is the earnest hope of his many friends that his health may constantly improve.

The new branch enterprise in West Argentine reaches many who attend no other religious services. The Sunday school numbers 70.

Nebraska.

DONIPHAN.—Rev. Edmund Cressman, preaching here and at West Hamilton and North Hastings, has signified his intention to close work at these points at the termination of his fifth year, July 31. During his pastorate 130 persons have been received to membership in the three churches, most of them on confession; a good parsonage has been secured at Doniphan and paid for, except a small amount due the C. C. B. S.; all the fields have been strengthened in their various departments.

HOWELLS.—Rev. Arthur Farnworth, pastor here and at Dodge and Fairview, has resigned his threefold charge and will leave the field in October. Mr. Farnworth's work here for the past three years has met with marked success. The churches at Dodge and Howells have increased in numbers and strength, and that at Fairview, now having a membership of 41, originated in revival services in the neighborhood led by Mr. Farnworth.

LINCOLN.—Plymouth. Rev. John Doane, with his family, has been spending two weeks at Crete, attending the Chautauqua Assembly and visiting his brother-in-law, Pres. D. B. Perry.—Butler Avenue. This church, supplied by Rev. A. F. Newell in connection with Vine Street, has been caring for its own services for the most part during his absence. Rev. Lewis Gregory of First Church preached there July 19.

CAMP CREEK AND MINERSVILLE.—Rev. J. L. Fisher rejoices in a constantly growing spiritual interest at Minersville, an old Missouri River town, with little religious thought until the organization of the Congregational church two or three years ago. The influence of church and Sunday school are beginning to tell for good in the community.

PACIFIC COAST.

California.

SAN JOSE.—Under the auspices of the State Sabbath Association a convention has just been held for the purpose of creating a better sentiment in regard to Sunday observance and looking to the enaction of a Sunday law. Leading men of the various churches participated. Sunday evening a union meeting was held, and 800 persons voted for a petition favoring a strict Sunday law.

SAN FRANCISCO.—Swedish. Rev. C. A. Anderson was given a cordial greeting by his large flock on his return from a 10 weeks' vacation in the East. The edifice of this growing church has been enlarged and later, rebuilt.

CRESCENT CITY.—Prof. G. C. Foster, principal of the high school, who frequently supplies the pulpits of his brethren, recently spoke at North Berkeley for Rev. J. C. Robbins.

Individual communion cups were used for the first time at Benicia, July 5.—Rev. W. H. Cross, for 13 years pastor of the Saratoga church, with his family is spending his vacation in Berkeley.

The Society of California Pioneers spent over $10,000 last year in relief work.

HAWAII.

HONOLULU.—Among the most important religious enterprises in the islands is a flourishing Portuguese mission maintained chiefly by the members of the Central Union Church, who contribute liberally of their time and money. The mission now has its own pastor, and July 9 the corner stone of a new building was laid, to cost, with land, about $12,000. The Sunday school alone numbers 130 and the new building will seat 600 persons.

OTHER CHRISTIAN WORK.

Marlboro-on-the-Hudson, N. Y., is to be the meeting place of the fourth annual conference of the Brotherhood of the Kingdom, Aug. 3–8, and the subjects of addresses announced on the program cover a wide range of topics, from The Future Christ and World-Wide Missions in Their Social Aspects to What Can the Farmer Do to Better His Condition and The Advantages and Necessity of a Higher Education in Agriculture. Among the speakers will be Archdeacon C. J. Wood of York, Pa., Hon. E. H. Crosby of New York city, Rev. E. T. Root of Baltimore, Prof. W. N. Clarke of Colgate University and Messrs. J. W. Kelgaard and G. T. Powell.

LIVE GOOSE.

Millet's "Angelus" is painted in oil colors; so is your front fence. But there's a great difference between them! The difference is in the painters and their method of handling.

Our bolsters, pillows and cushions are stuffed with feathers. So are those you see elsewhere. But there's a great difference between them. The difference is in the feathers themselves and in the method in which they are treated.

Our feathers are grown on plump, healthy live geese; we have them thoroughly cured after the most approved manner, and warrant them absolutely dry and odorless. They are carefully separated as to color, so that you can have white, gray, mixed, or as you wish.

Think of the chance to secure feathers of this description at the same price as ordinary feathers. We believe the evil of low-grade feathers is so great that we will never allow a pillow, cushion or bolster to be sent out to be stuffed. All such work is done only on the premises, and thus substitutions are impossible.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

The business situation continues as dull and as unsatisfactory as last reported. Since the banks came to the relief of the United States Treasury with their gold and Mr. Morgan and his associates arranged to provide many millions of exchange, thus checking the outflow of gold, there has been a distinctly better feeling in financial circles, which has in a measure communicated itself to mercantile interests.

The entire situation, however, both financial and mercantile, is still suffering from the uncertainties imposed by the extraordinary political outlook. A treasury crisis has been averted, but the battle for sound money has yet to be won, and pending the outcome there is sure to arise much that will be of a discouraging nature to business interests. Merchants have very wisely determined to go ahead slowly and are making no commitments of capital beyond what is absolutely necessary.

In some instances traveling men have returned from the road, but their reports of the condition of business are not enthusiastic. They say that merchants throughout the country will not buy as in normal years, because the political situation is so mixed that they don't know what to expect. They therefore purchase in a small way only and never more than they think can be easily disposed of.

If a change in the currency must come, all classes of merchants are in fair shape to weather a storm. What is so universally expected and prepared for, however, seldom comes to pass. Prices of staples continue low and credits are restricted. Iron and steel, if anything, show increased depression, with Southern pig iron notably shaded in price. Production of iron has been heavily curtailed, however, which is an encouraging feature. Cotton and woolens continue dull, with mills either closed or working on half time. Shoe factories are fairly busy, but largely on old orders. Bank clearings throughout the United States last week aggregated $989,000,000, which was about five per cent. in excess of last week and seven per cent. more than in the same week last year.

THROAT COMFORT.—Best at night; freedom from dryness and all tickling sensations may be secured by a small dose of Adamson's Botanic Cough Balsam. Public speakers, singers and professional men find it of great use. Sweet and pleasant to the taste. Sold everywhere.

A FACT WORTH NOTING.—Every one who is blessed with a delicate sense of smell knows the annoyance of badly-cured feathers in a pillow or upholstery. Minor discomforts sink into insignificance beside the disagreeable necessity of sleeping upon a pillow of this description. It may be a satisfaction to some of our readers to know that there is one house in this city where the finest of healthy live geese feathers are always to be procured. The feathers are thoroughly cured after the most approved manner, and are warranted absolutely dry and odorless. They can be found at the warerooms of the Paine Furniture Company on Canal Street.

BLUE MONDAY.

Deacon Goodsoul: "Blue Monday again! I feel as if I could hardly drag myself down to work."

Deacon Highmind: "Same way with me. Every Monday I'm all used up, and I don't know why. How were the congregations yesterday?"

"Large in the morning, fair in the afternoon, and quite good in the evening. The Sunday school was well attended, too, and the Bible class was full, while the young men's circle gained several members. I did not see you yesterday."

"No; I spent the blessed day of rest addressing our six mission schools, raising a church mortgage, and starting three new revivals.—New York Weekly.

HE KEPT THE FLOOR.

The Rev. Dr. X, occupying a charge in a New England church, announced some time ago that the regular weekly prayer meeting would be devoted to discussion of a certain question of general interest to the congregation. Many members of the church wished to take part in the discussion; it was therefore decided to limit each member's remarks to five minutes. When the speaker's time expired, the clergyman was to notify him by rapping with a pencil on the desk. Deacon A, a notoriously long-winded speaker and exhorter, was one of the members at whom the restriction was specially directed. As everybody anticipated, the Deacon was one of the first to address the meeting, and he had not fairly started on his remarks when the rap of the pencil was heard.

"Am I to understand," asked the Deacon, turning to Dr. X, "that my five minutes have expired?"

"Yes, Deacon; I am sorry, but your time is up."

"And all general remarks are limited to five minutes?"

"Yes; that was the understanding."

The Deacon turned very deliberately to his fellow-members. "Then, brethren," he preceeded, "I shall throw the remainder of my remarks into the form of a prayer."

The Deacon kept the floor.—New York Evening Post.

SEA BATHING AT HOME.—For all who are weak, rheumatic, nervous or dyspeptic, salt water bathing is conceded by the medical profession to be an excellent tonic. But hundreds of people who might be benefited are unable to reach the seaside. To such Ditman's Sea Salt brings the ocean, and at slight cost all the invigorating, beneficial effects of a salt sea bath may be obtained at home. The preparation, which is extracted from the ocean itself, has proved of untold value to invalids, calming the nerves, strengthening the muscles and inducing rest and quiet sleep. Ask your druggist for Ditman's, that being the only genuine.

GLEANINGS FROM OUR MAIL BAG.

DENUNCIATION DOES NOT HELP MATTERS.

Within a few days a white man confined under charge of murder was taken from jail and lynched within a few miles of the national capital. Yet more recently a negro was lynched still nearer Washington under similar circumstances. Disgraceful and demoralizing as such occurrences are to the counties, to the States and to the nation in which they occur, it has not seemed wise to introduce their discussion in national Endeavor meetings. Is it wise to denounce our own Government for wrongs in interior Asia when we are chary of locating censure for murder and torture at home? The Christian Endeavor Society has kept remarkably free from propagandism, but at the Washington meeting a session at one of the churches on the opening night was given to a stereopticon lecture on Armenia and one of the tent meetings of the last morning was devoted to the same subject. Literature was gratuitously circulated advocating a specific line of action and collections were taken. Not to quote at length from the literature circulated let this suffice: "The Turk is not a human being. I do not call him a beast, because not one of God's dumb creatures could sink so low. The Turk is a devil without a tail."

A little time ago Mr. Dwight of Constantinople and gentlemen from Boston and New York had conferences with the authorities here regarding Turkish affairs. Did they receive unsatisfactory treatment that justified the denunciations of Rev. B. Fay Mills? If they had reason to appeal to the people why were they not heard from? In the course of a long speech Mr. Mills is quoted as uttering the following extravagant language:

When the missionaries, who were threatened with death and with the destruction of their property and the interruption of their great work, appealed to the American minister at Constantinople his reply was, "Get out of Turkey." . . . I have an idea that if the Turkish gunboats were to bombard and destroy a Kentucky distillery our American minister would move fast enough; or if the mast of some millionaire's yacht lying at anchor in the Dardanelles were to be splintered by a Turkish shell fired by accident there would be a tremendous uproar; while if our President should happen to be on a fishing excursion in the Bosporus and the bullet of a toy pistol should chance to go through the sail of his craft the American people and Government would have it understood that that was some of our business. . . . The administration officers have turned a deaf and almost scornful ear to the entreaties and representations of some of our best citizens, missionaries, churches and moral societies.

Such talk as that indorsed by the Christian Endeavor will not help missionary boards in their negotiations with Turkey.

Washington, D. C. JAMES H. BLODGETT.

ENCOURAGING GAINS IN BUILDINGS.

Upon page 478 of the Year-Book for 1895 is a mistake of $2,000,000 in the amount of property invested in houses of worship. The copying clerk in carrying to the column of totals the amount invested in houses of worship in New York State dropped $2,000,000, consequently the column of totals should foot up forty-five rather than forty-three millions. In the report of our untiring secretary the correct amount is given in the minutes of the National Council, although as the report was in print at the time the council met it could not then well be corrected without causing some confusion.

In view of the fact that we have been rejoicing for a year in a gain of some four and a half millions in the valuation of our houses of worship it may be well for us to notice what the exact figures give us in the way of gain in 1895 as compared with 1890, about six and a half millions. This surely is a good showing.

And not all of this gain has been in the West. The fact is there has been for several years back a noteworthy advance in our church architecture. Old houses of worship, ill-adapted to modern requirements, have given place to church buildings in every way suited to modern needs. Massachusetts increased the valuation of her houses of worship —we are speaking of course of Congregational churches—to the amount of nearly $2,000,000. This increase, as all know who are conversant with the work of our churches, has been very largely in the way of erecting new houses of worship in place of old houses. Recall the new buildings in the towns of Franklin, Wakefield, Lexington, Orange, South Hadley, Newtonville, the new house of worship possessed by the First Church in Holyoke, the new Pilgrim Church building of Dorchester, and the new Mt. Vernon structure in Boston. We at once see what a good work we are doing in the way of improving our church architecture.

A YOUNG LAWYER'S WORD OF PROTEST.

Will you allow from a member of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor a word of repudiation of the extraordinary demonstration against the United States Government at the Armenian relief meeting on the closing day of the recent Christian Endeavor convention at Washington? It would have been bad enough had Mr. Mills merely taken advantage of the opportunity for prominence offered him by the holding of the Endeavor convention in the national capital to denounce in vigorous terms some well-recognized abuse on the part of the Government. But to charge the Government by false insinuation with failure to protect its citizens and their property, and then to denounce the Administration because it has not involved the country in a disastrous war was more than a mere exhibition of bad taste; it was absolute disloyalty. That attack showed a spirit unworthy a citizen or a Christian, and, although enthusiastically approved by an audience largely composed of Christian Endeavorers, I do not believe it to represent the opinion of the great body of the society throughout the country. The young people present at that meeting had been wrought up to the highest pitch of emotional excitement by the preceding speeches, and were easily led by Mr. Mills to join him in this sensational demonstration. The Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor has done not a little for good citizenship, and, if it is to continue this work, it should certainly repudiate every word of that denunciation.

Westfield, Mass. F. L. NORTON.

Be honest with yourself, whatever the temptation; say nothing to others that you do not think, and play no tricks with your own mind. Of all the evil spirits abroad at this hour in the world insincerity is the most dangerous —James Anthony Froude.

IN MEMORIAM.

MRS. B. B. EDWARDS.

The beautiful chapel cemetery in Andover within one short week has been consecrated anew by the precious dust of two remarkable women—Harriet Beecher Stowe and Mrs. Bela Bates Edwards. The lives of these women were contemporaneous in their residence in Andover, both had shared the professorial life of their distinguished husbands in the Theological Seminary, and both had contributed largely to the fame of Andover as a center of education and refined social life. The one was the most celebrated of American women; the other, her neighbor and friend, while less renowned was no less remarkable in the qualities of intellectual and moral character that make up the finest type of American womanhood.

Jerusha Williams (Billings) Edwards had the advantage of being well born. She was descended from that sterling New England stock in which intelligence, conscience, sturdy force of will, and unfaltering religious faith, were mingled and transmitted as a spiritual inheritance. Charles Eugene Billings, her father, was a man of force and influence in Conway, Mass.; for many years he was a colonel in the Massachusetts State militia, and rendered efficient service for his town in the State legislature. Her mother, Sarah Williston Storrs, was a daughter of Rev. Richard Salter Storrs, for many years the able and influential minister of the Congregational church in Longmeadow, Mass. He was the father of the eloquent Richard Salter Storrs, D. D., minister of the church in Braintree, Mass., and was the grandfather of the still more distinguished divine of international fame, Rev. Dr. Richard Salter Storrs, pastor of the Church of the Pilgrims, Brooklyn, N. Y. Mrs. Edwards was born in Conway, Oct. 3, 1809.

Among the maternal ancestors of Mrs. Edwards were Rev. Richard Mather, the father of the famous New England divine, Rev. Increase Mather, D. D.; and Rev. Solomon Stoddard, for sixty years the pastor of the First Congregational Church, Northampton, Mass. A tragic interest colors the family life of the early New England days. Mrs. Edwards's maternal great-grandfather, Rev. Mr. Williams, the minister of Deerfield, and his family were taken captive by the Indians during DeRouville's French and Indian invasion in 1705, and Mrs. Williams and her infant daughter fell victims to Indian savagery.

Mrs. Edwards was a true inheritor of the traits of mind and character of such a vigorous and godly ancestry. Her native gifts were matured and refined under peculiarly favorable opportunities for growth into all womanly graces. For fourteen years, as pupil, associate teacher, and intimate personal friend, she was brought under the formative influence of that celebrated educator, Mary Lyon, the founder of Mt. Holyoke Female Seminary.

After leaving the companionship of Miss Lyon, Miss Billings became a teacher in Ashfield Academy, where the youthful Bela Bates Edwards was also an instructor. Their acquaintance soon ripened into mutual love. Her academic education was afterwards completed at the Young Ladies' Seminary, Ipswich, Mass., then under the principalship of Miss Zilpah Grant, an educator of nearly as great renown as Mary Lyon. Meanwhile, Mr. Edwards had become the secretary of the American Education Society. After their marriage in 1831, they lived for two years in Boston, and two years in Andover, during his office as secretary. Mr. Edwards accepted the professorship of the Hebrew language and literature in the Theological Seminary in 1835.

Their married life in Andover covered a period of seventeen years. Their children were George Herbert, who died at the age of three years; Sara, the wife of Rev. William Edwards Park, D. D., Gloversville, N. Y.; and George Herbert, a young man of fine promise, who died at sea in 1863, during his Sophomore year in Yale College.

In April, 1852, Professor Edwards, the accomplished Christian gentleman, stimulating teacher, and brilliant ornament of American scholarship, died at Athens, Ga., in the fiftieth year of his age.

Bravely facing her great bereavement, Mrs. Edwards, in September, 1852, established a home-school for young ladies in her own house, now the property of the trustees of Phillips Academy, and occupied by Professor Ryder. Her assistants were her sister Elizabeth, Mrs. Hiram Mead, the president of Mt. Holyoke College, and her daughter Sara. One of the distinctive features of the school-life was the regular instruction in the English Bible and in moral philosophy by Andover's distinguished theologian, Professor Park. During the twelve years that Mrs. Edwards sustained her school more than a hundred and fifty young ladies enjoyed the inestimable privilege of the choicest intellectual culture and home influence under her wise and gentle guidance. Her pupils were devotedly attached to her, and to this day speak with deepest gratitude and affection of the unspeakable value of her inspiring personal influence, which has permeated and directed their subsequent lives. Nearly all of her pupils have lived to grow into the sweet and gracious womanhood that sanctifies and adorns the best type of American domestic life, and many are occupying positions of honor.

Mrs. Edwards relinquished her educational duties in 1864, but continued her residence in Andover for four teen years with the exception of two years spent in European travel (1872-74). Since 1878 she has made her home with her daughter, Mrs. Park, in Gloversville, N. Y.

Mrs. Edwards united extraordinary power of intelligence, sobriety of practical judgment and strength of affection, with a refined and gracious dignity of speech and bearing, whose charm was enhanced by a touch of quaintness belonging to the old school of manners. She inherited a strong religious tendency, and was brought up amidst strong religious influences; these influences found in her nature a rich soil in which they could lay firm hold. Religion, shaped by the principles of the New England school of theology, was the controlling power of her life. If a single phrase could convey the total value and impression of her life, it would be the—perfection of Christian ladyhood.

Her counsel was sought by able men of affairs, and the youth of her community were attracted by her serene and gentle wisdom. The town in which she spent the latter years of her life owes its public library and its savings bank to her suggestion. Possessed of a narrow income, she denied herself of many personal gratifications that she might give to objects of Christian philanthropy. Her spirit was as generous as her purse; hers was a charity that "thinketh no evil." The missionary enterprise was dear to her heart; she was intimately acquainted with its earliest leaders in America; she thoroughly knew its history and the varied aspects of its present activities. Her patriotism was intense; she kept herself well informed of the development of public affairs, and her views and opinions on national matters were judicious and influential. In the midst of the pain and weariness of her last illness she one day exclaimed, "This is a very important day." "Why so?" "Because it is the day for the Republican convention. We must all pray today, for the welfare of the country depends upon the action of this convention." She was an incessant reader of the best books; her taste was catholic, but her special fondness was for biography. Notwithstanding her strong and cultivated intelligence and force of character, there was an utter absence of obtrusiveness and pretense. Her mental character was marked by a perfect intellectual modesty. She simply and naturally radiated the influence of her refined culture of mind and heart.

This long, useful, beneficent, self-forgetful, and beautiful life of eighty-seven years came to its close in Christian faith and peace on Tuesday, July 7, after an illness of four weeks. A touching home-service was conducted by her nephew, Professor Swing, of Oberlin Theological Seminary. The interment was made at Andover in the chapel cemetery at seven o'clock on the evening of Thursday, July 9. Her former neighbor and friend, Professor Churchill, officiated at the simple burial-service. The friends who were assembled in reverence for her memory will never forget the suggestive harmony and solemn beauty of that impressive hour "when the day buried its golden sun in the dear, hopeful west."

HAY FEVER.

A Discovery for This Malady at Last—Relief at Your Own Home.

No one but the sufferer from hay fever knows the agony that attends this torturing malady. A continual round of sneezing, eyes that are weak, watery and inflamed, a nose that runs without cessation, and grows more sore every hour, inability to breathe, nights that become hours of torture, days that are long drawn out and full of suffering—and all this continues until the sufferer is obliged to pack up and go to some locality where this disease does not thrive. Formerly it was considered that the only way hay fever could be relieved was by a change of climate, the mountains of New Hampshire being noted as one of the best places in the world for this purpose. Now it is known by physicians and patients alike that sufferers of this trouble can be relieved at home by the use of X-Zalia. The preparation is an entirely new discovery in medicine, its merits for the relief of hay fever only becoming known within the last year or two.

X-Zalia is made from the sap of a certain tree, combined with other vegetable ingredients found in New Hampshire, and contains the necessary medicinal properties that have made New Hampshire air famous for the virtuous qualities it contains for the cure of this disease. Many sufferers who were skeptical have tried X-Zalia, and, to their surprise, found relief. Among those who may be referred to are Mr. W. F. Lakin, manager Consolidated Store Service Company, Fiske Building, State St., Boston; Mr. George E. Armstrong, of the firm of Clark, Ward & Co., bankers, Equitable Building, Boston; Mr. C. H. Stevens, Phillips Building, Boston; Mr. Walter L. Frost, 8 Congress St., Boston; Mrs. Wm. F. Richardson, 12 Elm St., South Framingham, Mass.; U. S. Senator J. H. Gallinger, New Hampshire.

It is expensive to take a long trip to the mountains for relief. It does not cost you much to try X Zalia right here at home, and be convinced as to whether it does what is claimed for it or not. Ask your druggist for X-Zalia. If he does not keep it send $1 to The X-Zalia Company, No. 3 Beacon St., Boston, Mass., and they will send one of their largest bottles, express paid, anywhere on line of railroad in the United States.

of baby health in summer weather depends on the baby's food. Nestlé's Food has been known for 35 years as invaluable in the prevention of cholera infantum and summer complaints. In its preparation for use water only is required, thus avoiding the addition of cow's milk, whose use in summer time is always a source of worry and danger to careful mothers.

Our book, "The Baby," full of valuable hints to mothers, and a sample can of Nestlé's Food, free.

A Few Earnest Remarks —ON— Price Cutting.

THE TRUTH.

That the price of STEARNS Bicycles is maintained while nearly every other wheel is sold at a cut, either openly by the makers, or by the agent (whose large discount practically invites this method), is the best advertisement the Yellow Fellow could have.

THE MORAL.

When buying a wheel select a STEARNS of standard value first, and avoid those dire pangs of regret occasioned by knowing that another person may in two weeks' time from your purchase procure the same make wheel at a drop price.

WHAT MEN SAY.

The Bible is written largely biographically and I'm glad for that, because I take great interest in a man when I don't take great interest in a thing.—Rev. A. F. Schauffler, D. D.

Blackboardists commonly subdivide and subdivide and subdivide, until, whereas you began by knowing something, you end by knowing nothing.—Rev. A. F. Schauffler, D. D.

Our Christian scholarship realizes that Babel and Pentecost are opposed forever, and that, in the light of Pentecost, we must welcome inquiry as to the righteousness of our regnant industrial system.—Dr. Gunsaulus.

I utterly refuse to believe that there is not something radically wrong in any administration of law which requires a month to be consumed in impaneling a jury.—Justice Brown of the Supreme Court at a Harvard Law-School Dinner.

Some one has well said: "Lift your hat reverently when you pass the teacher of the primary school; she is the great angel of the republic." It is still more true of the teachers of the primary department in the Sunday school. It is the position of highest rank and honor and power.—Hon. S. B. Capen.

I believe that the metaphysician of this day must be a psychologist and know what is going on. He cannot afford, as he once could, to construct epistemologies, and shoot theories of the universe out of a pistol, without regard to the facts which the psychologists are handling.—President Patton of Princeton.

I speak for thousands of plain, plodding practical business men planted all over the United States, who form the strong sheet anchor of our national prosperity, whose sound, safe sense, developed by experience and observation, pushes them to the front wherever, in their various localities, stanch men, true and tried, are wanted. And these many thousands will thank me for becoming their mouthpiece to testify their profound belief in the methods and their appreciation of the work of the Sunday school.—Hon. John Wanamaker.

I said that religion without education was apt to be superstition; and yet I would not undervalue the religious instinct which we sometimes call blind. Without it the history of the race would have been very different from what it is, and it needs no prophet to be sure that the history of the race will be vastly nobler than it would otherwise be if that blind religious instinct were left out of humanity. In the same way I value the blind patriotism that animates men, and that, without question, is ready to die for its country. And yet, precisely as a man does not reach his perfect stature until he prays with the spirit and with the understanding also, so I think that is the noblest patriotism which, beside being patriotic with this blind devotion to country, also strives with all the powers of an educated man to see that his country is kept right and is enlightened by the lessons of history.—Pres. Seth Low of Columbia College.

THE second summer, many mothers believe, is the most precarious in a child's life; generally it may be true, but you will find that mothers and physicians familiar with the value of the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk do not so regard it.

A RELIABLE INSTITUTION.—This can be truly said of the Bryant & Stratton Commercial School of Boston, which, as our readers will notice by the advertisement in this week's issue, will reopen Tuesday, Sept. 1. This school stands in the front rank of all schools of a similar character, and the value of its training is attested by hundreds of graduates who are occupying positions of trust in the leading counting-rooms of New England.

THIS summer has witnessed the awarding of the prizes for exhibits at the Columbian Exposition. Visitors to Chicago will remember what a creditable showing Congregationalism made in the gallery of the Liberal Arts Building, thanks to the perseverance and energy of Rev. G. A. Hood, who was appointed superintendent of the exhibit. Its success was such that it received the highest award for denominational exhibits, and a choice addition to the treasures of the Congregational Library has recently arrived in the shape of a beautiful silver medal, a full-sized reproduction of which we present on page 182. Accompanying it was an elaborate diploma engraved on parchment, a picture of which appears on our cover page. It may be something of a surprise to find the headquarters of the denomination given as Auburndale, Mass., but it is explained by the fact that this is the residence of the secretary of the National Council, Dr. Hazen. The exhibit has been presented to the Chicago Theological Seminary, in whose library it stands as a witness to "what Congregationalism has done for the world."

The Northfield Bible or General Workers' Conference is now in its fourteenth annual session, under the honored leadership of its founder, Mr. Moody. We expect to give a report of it next week from our special correspondent, but take this occasion to remind our readers that it has not only been the fountain of good directly to thousands, but has also become the fruitful mother of instrumentalities for good. Simple faith, an earnest devotional spirit and a wise and courageous zeal for personal service have characterized it from the first, and these qualities only deepen and broaden with its extended life. Among other significant features of its work this, perhaps, has been least commented upon, because instinctively taken for granted by every one at Northfield, that men of nearly all branches of the church catholic meet and speak and work and pray together, and it rarely seems to occur to any one to ask what particular sectarian name belongs to this one or to that. The range of choice for speakers may be narrow, but at least it has no relation to denominational lines. It is an object lesson of actual unity such as the Christian world can hardly show at any other place, and in this matter alone has a value which cannot easily be overestimated.

The constant courtesy and kindness experienced by The Congregationalist's pilgrims from the English people and press alike make it seem invidious to note the few exceptions, nor should we be inclined to do so if they had not become evident in a newspaper controversy on the other side. The Church Times, which identifies the body of Christ with a priestly caste, and the Spectator take the occasion of Ambassador Bayard's speech to join in an attack upon the Pilgrims of 1607, and their successors in the separated churches of today. Like many of the critics of the fathers, the Spectator seems to be ignorant of the distinction between the Pilgrim exodus to Holland and Plymouth and the Puritan settlement of Massachusetts Bay, and mixes its history accordingly. As for the Church Times, it suffers at every exhibition of vitality in the church outside its own party, and needs only to be laughed at—as The Congregationalist pilgrims laughed at the English vicar in a country parish who shook the dust from his feet and departed until the hated presence of non-Episcopal Christians was removed from his bounds. It is the little men of the church in all parts of it who cherish petty spite and encourage rancor; the large men may disagree, but they are careful to maintain the courtesy of Christians, and the frank and cordial hospitality of this more intelligent class of Anglican Christians no member of the party is likely ever to forget.

In some of the English papers of late a brisk discussion has been going on with this question as the point of departure, Why are not the clergy loved? As respects America at least the most sensible answer to such a nonsensical query consists, in our judgment, in disputing altogether the underlying assumption. It would be just as proper to ask why are not lawyers and teachers and storekeepers loved. Popularity, to be sure, is not the final test of character, but when it comes to picking out the men in a community who are most generally honored and beloved there is no class of professional men who are apt to entwine themselves in the hearts of their fellows more thoroughly than are the ministers. We were impressed at a seaside prayer meeting the other Sunday evening with the affectionate witness which several of the speakers bore to the part the men who were their pastors in former years had in bringing them to Christ. The surest way to make a person love you is to help him in his Christian way and warfare. All over this land hundreds of ministers are doing this week by week. Look at the city of Woburn, without distinction of creeds, paying tribute to Dr. Daniel March, who at the age of eighty receives, as he has for scores of years, the love and veneration of men, women and little children, "It has been my aim," said he, in replying to the congratulations showered on him, "to preserve the minister in the man, and the man in the minister." That combination of qualities is sure to tell.

The recent meeting in London of the Evangelical Alliance does not seem to have secured as much attention from the press as has been paid in years past to these international gatherings. Yet the holding in one week of thirty meetings, at which over 100 persons made formal addresses, shows that the organization is not losing its vitality or its hold on the public. Twenty nations were represented, as well as all shades of evangelical belief. And such men as Dr. John Hall, Rev. F. B. Meyer, Dr. John Smith and Sir William Dawson contributed their best thought to the discussion of great themes. The subject of Christian unity was naturally at the front, upon which Dr. Oswald Dykes made one of the most sensible and suggestive deliverances, deprecating a formal and external unity that fails to embrace all faithful Christians and exalting the real unity that proceeds from a common life in Christ. The fact that the alliance embraces in its membership representatives of the Protestant Episcopal Church is a hopeful element in its bearing upon fellowship between the denominations. Instead of forming new organizations to promote Christian unity let us avail ourselves of those already existing, especially when they have so honorable a history as the alliance.

THE TURN OF THE TIDE.

Happy is he who lives upon a rocky shore when the tide is at the ebb. For him there are weedy spaces in unaccustomed depths between the rocks where the waves leap singing in and out, and unusual stretches of white sand in the coves strewn with driftwood and torn threads of seaweed and other waste of the ocean, but no somber banks of mud gashed by the runnel beds and eloquent of helplessness, with stranded boats which lie keeled over waiting for the returning waters.

If the mud levels suggest despair, the rock hollows bear witness to a teeming life and expectation. The recurring waves wash in and out, lifting long streamers of the rockweed as if they were the dark meshes of a mermaid's hair. From some rounded, headlike stone below the ebb, with its long weeds lifted and drawn outward by the swell of the tide, some imaginative child or woman, no doubt, took the earliest suggestion of that human life beneath the waters, so full of possibilities of mystery and poetry, which is still real to a large part of the littoral peoples of the earth. The likeness is startling indeed as you gaze down into some narrow cleft. There is the head apparently just lifted as the wave draws out, and the long tresses, dark green and beautiful, spread out upon the fingers of its successor as it rises swiftly and breaks in foam high up in the mazes of rock kelp and against the barnacle-incrusted rock. See! she has dived and is gone back to her lover, her children, her palace of coral in the mocking depths. To the poetic instinct in even the most primitive of men—flint armed, furgirdled, ignorant of meter as of iron—the likeness could not fail to bring a thrill of wonder and delight.

By the same wave a long stringed devil's apron is tossed to the full length of its tether, the water sings with a deep gurgling note that ends with a sharp rising inflection as it reaches its utmost limit of impulsion, and the white spray flies up and falls at the watcher's feet on his rock above, or is borne by the wind in salt mist to his lips, while it dissolves the sunlight into a faint rainbow for his eyes' delight. Then there is a longer note, reluctant and ever varying as the wave runs out, and the rockweed on the face of the crags hangs dripping where the water drew and left it. Movement, variation, farcoming impulse, reluctant giving over of a swift purpose—all are here as images of a man's life that feels the movement of the magnificent world power behind it, gathers itself up for one great purpose at all cost of self, and when its work is done falls back into the deep again. And as we watch its strength die out and its successor follow, we are thankful that it is the rising, not the ebbing, tide on which we spend the force of our humanity, and that every life wave brings man nearer to the flood.

Not far apart upon the top of the red and shattered rocks are two pools, one several feet above the other. The higher of the two is shrunken and full of a green and glairy slime which it is not pleasant to see, but the lower lies like a miniature mountain tarn, overhung by giant cliffs and shining in the sunlight in exquisite limpidity and calm. Then a flaw of the light wind touches it and there is the sudden tumult of a pygmy tempest, with waves that in proportion to its size are mountain high. The upper pool is rain-fed and stagnant; the lower is renewed and vivified twice daily by the climbing tide. As it lies still and beautiful—a mirror of the cloudless sky—it is full of waiting and expectant life, which we may watch through the transparent waters. The fringe of kelp, the delicate seaweeds, to which periwinkles cling, the cracks and lines of cleavage of the rocky bed giving footing to strangely tinted sea mosses, rusty red, pale green and vivid brown and lilac, lazy barnacles, and one great starfish, like Gulliver among his dwarfs, astonished into lassitude by finding himself marooned in a place where there is neither prey nor exit. Lift the clumsy fellow out and turn him over, and see him feel aimlessly about with his hundred worm-like, wriggling legs for something to walk upon or prey upon or put into his central maw, and you are thankful that you were born into the world in an estate above that of the radiates, in spite of your increased responsibility.

All this time the tide is rising. It submerges point after point of weedy rock, and runs further and further up into the clefts of the craggy shore, each wave flinging its crest upon the upper levels, to pour back in noisy waterfalls whose music dies to silence as the next wave comes. Up the rock ladder toward the lower pool the breakers climb and climb. At last a single wave throws its spray over the barrier wall, and, as its drops fall, life stirs in all the shady hollows under kelp fringe and waving weed. Stillness returns; and then another dash of spray—a climbing wave whose crest falls over, a swift, recurring tribute from the sea to its imprisoned child, until at last the ocean takes the pool to its embrace again to nourish and delight it and prepare it for renewed trial of loneliness when the tide goes out. If it has the sorrow of waiting, it has also the patience of hope. If for awhile it lies bare to the sun's rays and the wind's buffeting, it belongs by nature and by expectation to the power and beauty and purpose of the sea that never fails to come to its relief. So God's purpose and refreshment include our waiting as completely as our active hours, and so his help is sure. But the poor, self-dependent pool to whose assistance the ocean never climbs shrinks in the sun, and gathers the dust of the world, and withers away at last with heat and drought—unsatisfied.

NOT VICIOUS, BUT MISTAKEN.

This most exciting political campaign which the United States has seen for a third of a century will be worth all of the anxiety and strife which it is causing provided it ultimately brings about greater sympathy between the widely different elements of our population. The Democratic-Populistic program is undoubtedly the product of something other than the desire of evil men to disrupt and ruin the country. It is true that it has attached to itself many who are at odds with their fellowmen, many of the shiftless and lazy who want to be supported at the public expense, but any progressive social movement is likely to be handicapped with that sort of a following. And the truth which those who ally themselves with the Republican party need to keep constantly in mind is that a large proportion of those who will vote the opposition ticket next autumn have the right to be considered honest and loyal citizens. They are not vagabonds and tramps; they are not loafers and shirks. Moreover, the cause in which they have enlisted is not, in its larger bearings, destitute of a measure of justice. We are not speaking now of the single issue of free silver, with regard to which, in the form in which it is before voters today, there is, in our opinion, only one course that accords with honor and rectitude, but of those great concerns of human life that throbbed underneath the Chicago platform, and which came to expression there in so many fantastic and lamentable utterances.

Behind that document was a widespread and conscientious conviction that the economic and industrial conditions of life in many sections of this country, and particularly throughout the West and South, are grievous and almost unendurable; that trusts and monopolies thrive at the expense of the common welfare; that between the cost of marketing his produce, on the one hand, and the ever-recurring interest on mortgages, on the other, there is little encouragement for even a hard-working man to attempt the cultivation of such fertile tracts of land as are spread all over our Western country. In short, the feeling on the part of hundreds of farmers is that there ought to be some way whereby life may become easier and more worth the living to themselves and their children. This sentiment any sensitive traveler becomes aware of the moment he crosses the Mississippi River, nor does he have to go as far west as the Father of Waters to catch many an intimation of this popular discontent. Dr. Wolcott Calkins, in his comparatively short stay in St. Louis, where he is supplying Dr. Burnham's pulpit, has grasped the situation accurately and reflects it in our columns this week.

Now it is the part of wisdom for broad-minded Christians, to say nothing of discerning statesmen, to give heed to the man in distress. Just so far as he has a just grievance, just so far as his getting into the mire is due to the greed and the brute force of men stronger than he, or to the working of economic conditions against which he is powerless, should there be sympathy and compassion. The ideals and the dictates of the religion of Jesus are not to be left out of this campaign. They have had much to do with causing the fermentation of the ideas that are asserting themselves on every hand. They will have more to do with settling every great financial and tariff question now before the American people, and with determining the relations which we shall ultimately come to assume toward one another than the politician dreams or the average church member dares to believe. The Christian religion is here to stay, and it will finally give the final shape and coloring to our national fabric.

Meanwhile we say to any who feel themselves disadvantaged and unfortunate, You have taken, in espousing free silver, the wrong path to better things. Every advance movement in the history of mankind must start from the bed-rock of honesty, and not even the most plausible and the smoothest of the advocates of free silver have been able to dispose of the fact that such a policy jeopardizes national and personal integrity. Nor are the orators any more successful in making it apparent how free coinage at the ratio of sixteen to one is going to better in a single particular the rank and file of our population. To paint brilliant word pictures of ready-made Utopias is a pleasant pastime for those who like it, but in our judgment the best friend the discontented man can have today is he who will puncture his delusions and arrest him in his chase after the will-o'-the-wisp.

TOO BUSY TO BE PATRIOTIC.

We are too busy to attend to public concerns. Our occupations press upon us all the time, neither leaving us by night nor deserting us wholly on Sunday, nor permitting us to enjoy our wheels in perfect peace. Our Scripture says that he that careth not for his own is worse than an infidel, and the pressure of competition is so keen that our own will not be cared for unless we concentrate all our effort upon making as many dollars as possible. We are too busy to pay attention to questions of government. If we can only get honest men in office, we think, the government will run itself all right, and we accept it as the expected thing when it goes right, but grumble vehemently when it goes wrong. This is the way in which we practically look after our public interests, and this is the balance which we strike between our private affairs and the public administration.

So we have gone on, withdrawing from political concerns as much as possible, our most prominent citizens unwilling to serve in the local or state branches of government, concentrated upon the pursuit of business and leaving the body politic, as a whole, to look after itself. We have been heedless of the laws which underlie every human law until our great cities are in the hands of plundering rings, and excited men, ill-informed upon the most vital question of the times, are exercising a tremendous influence.

Yet we have had warning enough. The evils of a currency of inferior quality have been demonstrated to the full, not only in the experience of many other nations, but also in the history of our State governments and of the Federal Treasury. Our people have been bitten and burned until it would seem as if we had been warned to the full of the dangers of a currency inferior to the best. But the burnt child has forgotten his burning. We have been so busy that we have not learned well the lesson of our own history, and are threatened with another infliction of ignorance and disaster from which we might have easily escaped if we had only profited by our past. A leading bookseller of Boston, standing the other day before his department of books on politics and government, said that the men who bought books were as one to a thousand of those who bought theater tickets.

If the intellectual and business leaders of the nation, instead of ignoring the signs of the times, had given thought to the education of the masses in sound finance, capital would not now be timidly preparing to hide itself and wait till the storm is past. Foreign creditors would not fear lest we pay our debts at fifty cents on the dollar and hasten to get rid of them before they go down on their hands. Manufacturers would not be preparing to encounter a storm and cutting off employment from laborers who need their daily earnings. Efforts are now being made by some business establishments in different parts of the East to distribute sound money literature all through the States where the silver doctrine is generally accepted. But they are tardy in setting about their work, and it promises to be an up-hill undertaking to save the West and South from a general stampede for a cheap currency which will only intensify the evils which it is desired to remedy.

All this might have been avoided. Our people desire to do the right thing in politics and the teachings of history are so unmistakable that no one who has become familiar with them can avoid seeing the consequences which are sure to follow a degradation of the currency of the country. We have been so busy making money and attending to the lighter duties and recreations after our day's work is over, so fond of our social clubs, our evenings of entertainment and indulgence of our musical and artistic tastes, that we have overlooked these concerns of the first importance. Good government is at the foundation of all our private prosperity and social enjoyment. If we neglect the higher, we may be sure that we shall pay the penalty and that the crash which comes with the overthrow of sound principles of government will carry our private business and our social enjoyment along with it.

The lesson is that we must study more diligently the problems of our times, put more thought into our government, into establishing relations of justice and equality between man and man, between class and class, into teaching the lessons written plainly in the calamities of our past and in doing all in our power to make the people see these lessons so vividly that they will not need to go through the experience of the fathers in order to learn them. We cannot learn these things by neglecting them. We cannot get the right principles of government by instinct nor be sure of enjoying them by sheer good luck. We still have many things to learn in the way of independence of political bosses, and of the duty of putting country above party. We need to cultivate a higher moral sense so that we can discern the meanness of the repudiation which is involved in proposing to pay our debts in dollars of half value. We need to be better informed regarding the easily ascertained facts and not accept as truth a mass of falsehoods or half truths because they coincide with our prejudices against any system of finance or against any class in the community. We must pay more attention to our government and to our political duties, and accept willingly frequent interruptions in our private concerns in order to be sure that our public policy is right and that our public men are the best ones to carry it out successfully.

USE AND ABUSE OF AMUSEMENTS.

The true object of amusements is to recreate and refresh body and mind, and thus they do a useful work for the heart also. They have a legitimate and even necessary place in the scheme of a wisely ordered life. They afford rest, entertainment and temporary relief from burdens of care, and also they supply physical invigoration.

But they likewise offer opportunity for grave temptation. Some are evil in themselves. Others, inherently capable of being enjoyed innocently, have been so thoroughly appropriated by wrongly-minded people that they have become identified popularly with sin, are enveloped by an atmosphere of evil, and cannot be indulged in without serious moral risk, if at all, by those who seek to be holy. Fortunately there is no lack of those which everybody concedes to be harmless so that nobody need suffer for want of lawful and proper pleasure.

There is hardly another matter in regard to which we so often judge one another hastily. It is one pre-eminently as to which the exercise of private judgment must be insisted upon and allowed. It may not be rightly overlooked, too, that circumstances alter cases essentially in respect to amusements. What is right here may be wrong elsewhere because of different conditions. What is wrong today may be right next year. There are many men alive and not yet old who were forbidden to roll ten-pins in their college days, because that form of sport was supposed to be evil. Now every college gymnasium is equipped with alleys.

The test of an amusement is simple. Will indulgence benefit me physically, intellectually or spiritually, increase my influence for good, and help, rather than hinder, my right relation to God? If so, it may be enjoyed safely. If not, I should abstain from it, no matter how harmless it may seem to be in itself.

The tendency of our time is to give undue prominence to amusements merely as such. Christians may not forget that theirs is a serious purpose, and that amusement must not be so indulged in as to hamper the upward progress of the soul.

Field-Marshal Lord Wolseley, commander-in-chief of the British forces, said what doubtless is true, if not politic, when testifying before the Indian Military Commission he remarked, "I should not like to fight the army of France or Germany or any other army with Indian troops," but his remark will not increase the loyalty of the Indian army to Great Britain, or better the lot of the Indian state officials already chafing under the recent decision of the ministry and Parliament to compel India, not only to furnish troops for the war in the Soudan, but pay their expenses.

CURRENT HISTORY.

Plymouth Recalling the Pilgrims.

The citizens of ancient Plymouth and its vicinity, and others temporarily resident in that quaint town and section of the commonwealth, irrespective of their denominational affiliations, have, during the past week, been recalling and portraying, in a picturesque and effective way, scenes in the lives of the Pilgrims when resident in Old England, Holland and on the shores of Massachusetts Bay. Guided by an expert director of such pageants and arrayed in quaint and beautiful garments, young and old have united to set forth in tableaux such historic events as William Bradford's Farewell to Scrooby, The Embarkation of the Pilgrims from Delfshaven, The Landing of the Pilgrims on Plymouth Rock, etc. Lineal descendants of Myles Standish and others of the famous first settlers have participated and contributed to the success of the festival, and many who in no way are identified with the Pilgrim history or faith have doubtless been inspired and instructed by the entertainment provided. The funds which will accrue from this festival will go toward building the tower and recasting the famous bell which Paul Revere gave to the Congregational (Unitarian) society, whose edifice was destroyed by fire about a year ago, and thus will help give to the Liberal Unitarian congregation a fully equipped edifice wherein doctrines will be set forth which scarcely justify the present congregation in calling themselves spiritual descendants of the Pilgrims, straight as may be their lineage and perfect their legal title to the property.

The Political Outlook.

Mr. McKinley's speeches to Grand Army veterans and to wage-earners from Pittsburg last week were more unequivocal than ever in their distinct adherence to the gold standard, and have established confidence in him with many who hitherto have found it impossible to indorse unreservedly his candidacy. Speaker Reed's speech to his old constituents in Maine who have renominated him for Congress was a temperate, sensible, noble discussion of the vital issue of the campaign, calculated to win votes, clarify men's thoughts and establish still more his right to the title of being a statesman. Especially fine and opportune was his tribute to the Democrats, who in the Civil War sank partisanship and became patriots; and his expression of the conviction that it is the duty of the Republican party in this campaign to make like action by the Democrats now as easy a matter as possible will have beneficent effects.

The forceful statement just put forth by the gold-standard Democrats of Massachusetts is typical of many others that will be issued in due time by those like-minded in other States; and it is apparent that there will soon be a new national Democratic convention which at least will formulate a conservative platform and create a rival national organization, but whether a third set of candidates will be nominated is not so certain. Representative men and journals, hitherto non-Republican, differ much on this point, and will be able to see more clearly, four weeks hence, what should be done in order to accomplish the defeat of Mr. Bryan.

It is by no means certain that all the Populists will fuse with the Democrats in this campaign. Thus far the proposition to do so has been defeated in about as many Populist State conventions as it has been accepted, and, even where the leaders arrange for the "deal," it by no means follows that they can perfect the necessary electoral machinery or deliver the votes of the rank and file. Senator Wolcott has gained the upper hand in Colorado, and the Republican State convention there has indorsed the national candidates and the platform as a whole. Tammany's executive committee has indorsed the candidates nominated at Chicago, but not the platform formulated there. By so doing Tammany has revealed its real character once more to the people of New York city; it has alienated many who hitherto have been its stanchest supporters with funds and editorials; and it has contributed much, it is thought, toward its own defeat in the approaching municipal election. Through Senator Hill's influence the Democrats of the Empire State have been saved the necessity of an immediate declaration of position, as the matter of accepting or rejecting the Chicago platform has been left for the State convention to determine in September. Meantime the crusade for a gold-standard Democratic platform, candidate and new machine, if necessary, goes on within the State and without it.

Mr. Levering, the Prohibition candidate for president, accepted his nomination last week in a formal address, which is sincere and lofty in its tone, but almost amusing and pathetic in view of the situation which the voters face. With prohibition as a State issue waning in its power to influence voters, it is hardly probable that its grip upon the people as a national issue will wax. Men like Rev. Dr. Herrick Johnson, who for years have been voting the Prohibition ticket, do not hesitate to say that they intend this year to have something to say about increasing or diminishing poverty—and thus much intemperance—in a more direct way than by voting for Mr. Levering, and their example will not fail to influence the rank and file of the party.

The Clergy and the Issue.

Believing as we do, and have already stated, that the campaign upon which we are entering is a great one, and great because an issue is before the people which is ethical, it does not surprise us to find that men, both editors or preachers, set for the defense of ethical standards are deliberately declaring their convictions, indifferent to the possible divisive effects of such utterances upon subscription lists or congregations. Mr. Charles Dudley Warner is reported as saying that he relies on the Germans, the Jews and the Roman Catholic Church to give a victory to the party which he believes should win, namely, the Republican. This implies, perhaps, that the Protestant and native stock of the country are less to be trusted than certain elements of the population which some usually affect to scorn. There certainly is enough truth in the statement to make it worth while to consider just what the situation is today, and where the elements of the community are that are radical and where those that are conservative.

Nevertheless, we are not prepared to admit that the real conserving force in this country is now to be found, either exclusively or predominantly, among German Lutherans, orthodox or liberal Jews, or German, Irish and Italian Roman Catholics. The standard bearers in this campaign are loyal, active lay members of the Methodist, Presbyterian and Baptist denominations, and sects that are capable of nurturing men fit to be presidential candidates must be reckoned with when it comes to electing them. Hence we are not surprised that representative Protestant leaders, men like Bishop Newman of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Rev. Dr. R. S. MacArthur, the eminent Baptist preacher of New York city, Rev. Drs. H. M. Field and T. L. Cuyler, the Presbyterian journalists, Rev. Messrs. Washington Gladden and Henry A. Stimson of our own fold, have, either in interviews, contributions to the religious press or pulpit utterances let it be known how they intend to speak and vote, and why they think their fellow-citizens should do likewise. Clergymen as ethical teachers will do well to enforce principles from their pulpits; and leave applications of principles to concrete facts for their contributions to the press, their interviews with reporters, and their informal and formal spoken words to men as they meet them as neighbors or fellow-citizens.

The Massacre at Van.

Miss Grace Kimball, writing from Van, attributes the recent uprising and awful massacre at Van and the surrounding villages to Armenian revolutionists, "scamps from Russia and Bulgaria," an "energetic band of criminals," who, under "the guise of heroes and patriots," quartered themselves on the peaceful inhabitants, demanded money, incited the young Armenians to rebellion, defied the British consul and American missionaries and compelled the Turkish Government to act vigorously, which led to a fanatical outbreak against all Armenians, the innocent as well as the guilty. Nothing but the bravery and good judgment of Major Williams, the British consul, and the American missionaries, led by Dr. Reynolds, saved the entire Armenian population of Van from extinction. At one time the British flag floating over the American mission sheltered 15,000 Armenians from the Turk's wrath. No wonder the Prudential Committee of the American Board is endeavoring through the State Department to express its gratitude to Major Williams.

The International Socialist Congress.

The fourth International Socialist Trade Congress held in London last week had 800 delegates present, representing the United States, Australia, the Argentine Republic, as well as the chief countries of Europe. Strife arose at the first session over the admission of anarchists, continued until they were ejected—first by force and then by ballot—and did not cease then. So disputatious were the delegates, so little in common did they seem to have, save discontent with existing conditions, that the impression made upon the representatives of rank and file of organized labor in Great Britain present must have been conducive to serious thought, and have suggested whether or not the wage-earner has much to gain by allying himself with men so passionate, self-centered and destructive. The press of Europe agrees in the opinion that the London meeting will not strengthen the cause of Socialism in Europe. That the congress declared in favor of international arbitration and universal education indicates that wisdom is not utterly alien to their thoughts.

The Conviction and Imprisonment of Jameson.

The events of the past week in Great Britain have, to quote the words of Sir W. Vernon Harcourt, gone far to make plain that Great Britain does not "desire to extend empire or to gain wealth perfas et nefas, by fraud, by falsehood and by bribery." The English press, since Jameson's raid, arrest and return to Great Britain under duress, has, to quote the same authority again, appealed to the basest and most sordid motives to induce the English people to accept and condone in the Duke of Fife, the Duke of Abecorn, Sir Cecil Rhodes and Dr. Jameson that conduct which, if done by middle-class tradesmen or nether-class vagrants, would be denounced as theft and punished as such. It is gratifying to find that the British judiciary is still a bulwark of society and a saviour of national honor at a time when other forces in society are disintegrating and deteriorating. Much remains to be done. Fifteen months as a first-class demeanant in an English prison is a comparatively light penalty for Dr. Jameson when the enormity of his offense is considered, and even Sir Cecil Rhodes himself sees that it is not fair for him to be at liberty in South Africa when the man who is suffering for obeying him is languishing in prison, so, through his counsel, he has volunteered to return to England and stand trial if desired by the officials; but the swiftness with which the jury in the Jameson case passed upon the evidence, then formed its opinion after a masterly charge by the chief justice, Lord Russell, and saw sentence pronounced, will go far towards re-establishing Britain's good name. That Mr. Chamberlain accepted all the amendments offered in the House of Commons extending the scope of the inquiry by that House into the administration of affairs in South Africa, which inquiry he proposed as a natural sequence of the verdict in the Jameson case, shows that he, at least, is determined to have a thorough probing of all matters pertaining to the past and future of British imperial interests in South Africa, and if he is allowed a free hand most sensational and dramatic consequences may be expected in due time.

NOTES.

Father Sebastian Martinelli, prior general of the Augustinian Order, has been selected by Leo XIII. as Mgr. Satolli's successor as papal delegate to the United States. He visited the United States in 1893, but otherwise knows no more about us than his predecessor did when he was appointed.

The Supreme Court of Michigan has just rendered a decision which holds that the regents of the University of Michigan are supreme in their authority, and not subject to the interference or dictation of the legislature. The Supreme Court of South Dakota has decreed that the question of repealing the prohibition amendment of the State constitution must be settled at the approaching election.

To those of us who have been deploring the inefficiency of Congress, it may be consoling to know that the London Chronicle, surveying the record of the present Parliament, says, "The Parliament of our time is a sorry machine after all." And Mr. Balfour himself, in a recent speech said, "Set the angel Gabriel to lead the House of Commons under existing circumstances, and he could not save more than one week or ten days in the session."

The liquor dealers of New Hampshire are preparing to elect, if possible, a legislature which will repeal the prohibitory law of the State. To defeat this purpose and crystallize the temperance sentiment of the State, Hon. D. C. Remick, the prominent official of the State Law and Order League, has announced his candidacy as senator from the Concord district. He leaves his candidacy in "the hands of the Christian citizenship of the district and a just God," and pledges himself to procure a better enforcement of the prohibitory law, to elevating the standard of official integrity, which has sunk so low that its present state is "a menace to the State's prosperity and form of government," to rigid but not false economy in State finances, and to securing legislation which will raise the "age of consent from fourteen to eighteen years."

Boston welcomed the Ancient and Honorable Artillery back last Friday. The chaplain, Rev. A. A. Berle, commenting on and interpreting the significance of the unprecedented reception given to this body of American citizens, says: "It was, in my opinion, intended as much for European delectation and attention as for American. I believe, and the opinion is verified in my mind by the cautious and careful nature of Mr. Bayard's address, that it was a distinct part of the English Government's purpose to impress upon the European governments the fact that an Anglo-American alliance was one of the things with which European diplomacy might in an emergency have to reckon. Certainly I heard the thought expressed by men in the House of Commons that talk about England's isolation would be cheaper than before when these demonstrations were carefully studied."

IN BRIEF.

Next week our annual educational number will furnish a large variety of important contributions relating to schools and colleges, and to a wide range of current educational questions and movements. Libraries and their uses will be given special attention, Mr. Herbert Putnam, who is at the head of the Boston Public Library, having prepared a timely article on the subject. Rev. A. E. Winship will answer the question, Are the Public Schools Holding Their Own? Rev. J. W. Buckham will write upon the Bible in Our Colleges, and Miss Katharine M. Quint, the first woman to receive the master's degree from Dartmouth, will pass some observations upon her year at a man's college. Our London representative will review the recent great struggle in England over the Education Bill, from our Chicago editor we shall have a description of the numerous lines of activity which have their home in Armour Institute, and an editorial correspondent will give some account of the Bible Conference at Northfield. In other particulars the issue will be one of exceptional timeliness as well as of permanent value.

The Manhattan Congregational Church, New York City—this probable title of Dr. Stimson's new church on the West Side has a dignified sound, and, inasmuch as the movement which he has consented to head includes some of the strong laymen of the city, it looks as if Congregationalism might get a permanent foothold in that part of upper New York.

Another region which for five years past has been promising soil for Congregationalism is at last in a way to be cultivated. The section of Brookline in the vicinity of the Chestnut Hill Reservoir is considered the most favorable ground in any of Boston's suburbs for the establishment of a new church. The enterprise is now, we rejoice to say, on a firm foundation. The people on the ground are united and enthusiastic. The sympathy of the denomination is abundantly assured, and in Mr. Hale a wise, strong and able leader has been secured.

Good news continues to come concerning Mr. Joseph Cook, now at his summer home, Cliff Seat, Ticonderoga. He is able to ride out frequently and has taken several short walks.

The Merrimack Journal is authority for the statement that a Maine Congregational pastor went fishing with a party the other day off York Beach and returned with a haul weighing between 600 and 700 pounds! These "fishers of men" occasionally strike ten in affairs terrestrial or marine as well as celestial.

After the United States and Great Britain have perfected their compact of amity now being devised by statesmen, the next step, so says Hon. James Bryce, M. P., will be to make it possible for the courts of each land to recognize the binding effect of the decrees of the other, thus making it possible for a man to have the rights of citizenship in both countries.

Some of the most distressed individuals we have met during the hot weather spells have been the popular ministers and other favorite platform speakers who in the dead of winter made appointments to deliver addresses at summer assemblies. Now, as they contemplate the long, tedious journeys which such engagements necessitate, they are inclined to think they were overmuch persuaded.

We are happy to chronicle the fact that for the first time in the history of the White Mountain region no liquors of any kind are sold over the bars of any of the summer hotels, small or large. This is convincing proof that the Law and Order League of New Hampshire is achieving noteworthy success in its efforts to secure a general and undiscriminating enforcement of the prohibitory statutes.

There would be less running away from one's own church even in the vacation season, and for the purpose of spending a second hour under the spell of a particularly attractive preacher, if the truants were always rewarded as some of whom we heard last Sunday, who journeyed to a neighboring city to meet the surprise of hearing the sermon of the previous Sunday repeated. However, some sermons are worth hearing twice.

It was at a seaside resort where natives and visitors mingled freely in the local prayer meeting and fulfilled to some extent at least their respective parts in sustaining it. But it did not conduce to the self-possession of the visiting brethren when, just after the leader had thrown the meeting open, one of the townspeople spoke up sharply and said, "Them two city fellers better speak now, for none of us folks will until they've finished."

"Count" Zuboff, arrested on a charge of forgery, committed suicide in a New York city prison cell last week. Thus ended the career of a Lithuanian Jew, an alleged Russian count, and one of the cleverest, worst impostors of which society has record. There are not a few society and literary folk in Boston who "could a tale unfold" were they disposed to hide their mortification and publish to the world the record of their gullibility.

Possible complications incident to the taking up of pastoral work by women, particularly by ministers' wives, are suggested by the following amusing incident. A Vermont clergyman found it necessary to correct a widespread misapprehension in the community by explaining at a recent public meeting that it was his wife, not himself, who had accepted a call to a neighboring parish, and that in consequence he, and not she, would be the pastor's assistant.

"One day," says the New York Sun's correspondent at the Vatican, "Leo XIII. gave an audience to the Abbé Margotti, editor of the Unità Catolica. After speaking of church matters the pope summed up his advice in this epigrammatic formula: 'Avanti mai, adietro sempre'—'Never in front, always behind'—that is, never put yourself at the head of a movement; do not command, but obey the impulse given by the church authorities." Such are the limitations of Roman Catholic journalism.

As certain New England churches and villages have become famous as the places whence great preachers have gone to higher stations, so in Scotland the Free Church in Drumtochty, immortalized by Ian Maclaren, sent him to Liverpool, Dr. Candlish to Aberdeen, and Rev. George F. Steven to Edinburgh, and now the United Presbyterian pastor has been summoned to a Glasgow church. Perhaps as notable an instance of promotion on this side the water was Dr. Parkhurst's transfer from Lenox, Mass., to New York.

The first detachment of The Congregationalist's Pilgrimage Party arrived in New York at noon last Friday. They encountered a heavy gale on July 27 and considerable fog added to the disagreeableness of the voyage. But the stanch Normannia made the trip within seven days and her officers left nothing undone for the comfort of the passengers. The "pilgrims" on board were Rev. Messrs. Richardson, Holden, Sargent and Soule, General Wheeler, Drs. Wallace and Scott, Mrs. West and the Misses Burnham, Pierce and Dyer.

Rev. A. Holden Byles, one of the English leaders of the Pleasant Sunday Afternoon movement, has been spending a week in Boston prior to sailing next Saturday from Montreal for home. Few of our English brethren have acquired such extensive and accurate information respecting the United States as Mr. Byles now possesses after an eighteen months' sojourn here. He has resided the larger portion of the time in Omaha, where for many months he supplied the First Church. He has taken two trips to the Pacific, and has also traveled widely throughout the northwestern and southwestern sections of the country. Being a veteran newspaper man as well as a preacher, he is quick to grasp and diagnose local conditions. We could wish that one who is so sympathetic with genuine and sensible theological, social and ecclesiastical progress, and who is at the same time such an acceptable preacher of the gospel, might find it in his heart to remain permanently among us. Mrs. Byles also won many friends in Omaha while acting as pastor of one of the newer churches.

Mr. Byles, by the way, tells a good story about the Democratic candidate for president in his relation to the Pleasant Sunday Afternoon movement. Mr. Byles was requested to aid one of the Omaha Presbyterian pastors in starting such a service and the first gathering was a conspicuous success. Mr. Byles's advice to his fellow-worker was to avoid any special endeavors to secure an attendance by announcing eminent speakers, but rather to make the meeting itself the chief attraction. On the second Sunday this wise counsel was disregarded, and Hon. William J. Bryan was invited down from Lincoln. He spoke for fifty minutes, constructing an elaborate argument for the being of God. Some time later Mr. Byles met a member of the Presbyterian church and asked him how the Pleasant Sunday Afternoon movement was progressing. His laconic reply was, "Bryan killed it."

Charity Chance.

A Serial Story By Walter Raymond.

To see at a glance the little hamlet of Babblecombe you must stand upon the crest of the hill.

There in the coombe below, its half-a-dozen houses, thatched and whitewashed, snugly lie together close, like eggs of a greenfinch in a nest of twigs and moss. The road, which wanders winding down the hill, runs straight in front. The woods, which upon one side cover the steep, reach down to the slanting gardens at the back. The brook is so small and overgrown with bushes you would never know it was there but for a gleam of silver where it feeds the mill.

You can hear the humming of the wheel, the shiver of the leaves when the wind sweeps up the coombe, the startled chatter of the jay as the village boys run through the wood. But to every sense of rural sweetness and every charm of sylvan sound another joy is added. The breath which sets the gentle ash a whispering to the sturdy oak blows fresh with the fragrance of the brine, and a mile away, a rich gem set in the open gap between the cliffs, stretches the broad sea, sometimes deep as sapphire and sometimes delicate as pearl. There also are the gray roofs and square church tower of the little town of Babblemouth, and the slanting masts of one Cardiff collier.

Beyond the nest of cottages, but a little higher on the hillside, a small mansion stands apart. Whatever the essential feature which constitutes a house a mansion—whether a winding staircase with an oaken balustrade, a yew hedge, stables with a weathercock, or two gates and a carriage drive—this dwelling possesses it above cavil or dispute. A large pillared portico amply supports that dignity, together with the projecting bedroom overhead. At first sight this stately adornment conveys an impression that the house is mostly hall. Yet it is homelike, too, for clematis climbs over the front and a white rose reaches far above the windows. The mansion faces full toward the sea.

Great steamships of Bristol and the Welsh ports pant to and fro in the dim distance, and sometimes, when spring tides run strong, creep up the channel under the cliffs. At summer noon the sunlight gleams on passing sails as white as snow. At eve some weather-beaten brig or schooner, beating west, stands like a blot upon the glory of the setting sun. They pass the place unheeding, their names and destinies unknown. None but the Cardiff collier ever comes to Babblemouth.

The tourist has not found this haven of rest. The cyclist dare not risk the hill leading down to Babblecombe. An atmosphere of old world respectability pervades everything, from the smoke, domestic, gray and clean of commerce, which mantles the town in mist, to the sweet shadow above the open cottage door between the honeysuckle and the eaves.

"YES," NODDED THE LITTLE LADY, "I LIKE YOU IN WHITE."

The coombe is a little heaven upon earth, where everything you say will be repeated and everything you do is known.

II. THE GARDEN PARTY.

"Charity, just give me your arm, dear. How warm the sun is. I will sit in the shade by the yew hedge and they must come to me there. I hope the strawberries will be enough."

"More than enough, dear aunt, you may rest assured," said the girl, tenderly. Then she added, with sudden impatience, "Enough to have satisfied the children of Israel in the wilderness."

Leaning upon her silver-headed ebony stick, but firmly grasping the girl's wrist with a thin hand, half hidden by a lace mitten, Miss Graham cautiously descended the two steps where the French window opens upon the lawn, and they slowly walked along the path together—Charity Chance and this little lady whom she called "aunt."

They were both beautiful—Charity, in the glorious wealth of her young womanhood, with everything to learn and all to live, and before her the broad land of love untrodden and unexplored; and the little cripple, crooked and misshapen from her birth, who had hobbled threescore years alone, brightening every step with the light of her own soul.

By the border where pinks and mignonette were in full flower the woman's fingers pressed more closely upon the girl's arm, and without a word they stopped.

"Stand where I can see you, child," she said, withdrawing her hand and pointing before her with a gesture half playful, half peremptory.

The girl stepped a few paces aside, and, laughing, stood to be looked at. Behind her the gray stones of the house peered between the delicate tracery of a Virginia creeper. At her feet were the flowers.

"O, yes, it is all right," she cried, a gleam of mischief flashing in her eyes. "And if not, what matter?"

"Yes," nodded the little lady with slow deliberation; "yes, I like you in white. Turn round a little, dear. Yes—and I like you in the hat. It suits you well."

Her mind at rest upon these matters the striking beauty of the girl forced itself upon her heart afresh. "Charity! You might be a princess, child," she burst out, in sudden enthusiasm; then she sighed. "But you know the wish of my life, dear. You know the one wish of my life."

A rapid glance of understanding and the light faded from the girl's face. Her large brown eyes became thoughtful, and she turned away and looked toward the hillside.

It was midsummer. The sky was clear, the air full of light, and sunshine rested upon hill and cliff. Only far across the sea a rising cloud, capped with gold, loomed through the gray haze. The woods were still, as if asleep; the birds silent, as they often are in the heat of a summer afternoon. Nature was in suspense.

Charity stood as in a picture, without word or sign of answer—a girl of nineteen years, tall and shapely as a lily, her frock of white nun's veiling clinging around her shoulders and falling soft as snow upon her bosom. The broad Leghorn hat cast a soft shadow across her cheek, but could not altogether keep the sunlight from the red-brown hair that hung in waves upon her forehead.

Her aunt's appeal, pathetic in the love which prompted it, touched no new note. The hope, that could almost bring tears into the little lady's eyes, had been familiar for many a day. It could not startle; but the hightened color on the girl's cheek and her quickened breathing betrayed the agitation it had power to arouse.

*Copyrighted, 1896, by Walter Raymond.

"Well, well, child. Come along." A sigh —an impatient beckoning of the long, thin fingers—and side by side, as before, they walked along the path.

The yew hedge beginning by a corner of the house reached the whole length of the lawn. Beside it garden seats and chairs had been brought in readiness into the shade. To the largest of these, an armchair with a high back of carved oak, raised with a cushion and provided with a footstool, Miss Graham solemnly ascended and seated herself in state. By this device, at which some people smiled, the poor little lady sought to cover the unkindness of nature by concealing her deficiency of stature. In her left hand she still held the silver-headed stick.

Her manner of dress she had not varied for many years—a soft black satin gown, open at the throat; an embroidered muslin kerchief, crossed and fastened with a miniature in an oval frame of twisted gold—the portrait of a woman, young and beautiful, with features and expression strikingly like her own; a mushroom hat of plain black straw tied with black ribbons underneath the chin.

The quaintness of this unpretentious attire was in keeping with the sweet simplicity of the face, which smiled upon Charity with the unchanging serenity of a Madonna in the full contentment of maternity. Her forehead was broad and smooth, with fewer wrinkles than her years might claim. Her hair, once fair, was not yet white, and out of her frank, gray eyes looked a soul alert and happy in the confidence that it could see nothing but good.

The girl's arm, taken for support, was still retained from affection.

"Listen, Charity, dear! What is that?" she suddenly cried, in alarm.

From across the sea, like a warning murmur of discontent, came the sound of distant thunder, and they saw that the cloud on the horizon had risen rapidly.

"It is a long way off. They have it in Wales," laughed the girl in consolation.

"If it should rain"— the little lady stopped abruptly and raised her hands in horror at the thought. "But somebody is coming, child. I can hear wheels on the road, and John Sprake is hurrying to open his gates. Perhaps the Babblemouth people and Graham. Run down to the door, dear, and bring them round here."

As Charity passed along the path a look of joy and exultation, such as belongs only to a dream of love, flitted across the cripple's face.

Through the gates of Babblecombe House, now open wide, trotted a one-horsed wagonette, bringing the first arrivals to Miss Graham's garden party. But not the Babblemouth people and Graham. Merely Rev. Mr. Mortimer, rector of Babblemouth, ronnd-faced and clean-shaven, with his tall, lean wife and a judicious selection from his numerous daughters.

"Put him where he won't get kicked, John," cried he, throwing the reins upon the back of the most patient beast in Christendom. Then he greeted Charity with condescension. "O! How do you do, Miss Chance?" he asked, almost as if her presence were a surprise.

"In the garden, dear, I suppose," piped Mrs. Mortimer, with that rich smile which creams upon the countenance when the milk of human kindness has turned a little sour. She pecked the girl's cheek with her sharp face, and marched away as if she were at home.

"Good afternoon, Charity," said Theodosia, the eldest.

"Good afternoon," echoed Amy and Amelia.

They were shy of Charity Chance, perhaps a little afraid of her. Tall and straight, and cool even in that hot weather, they shouldered their tennis rackets and followed their father up the garden path, like grenadiers in single file.

"Amazons!" muttered the girl contemptuously between her teeth, "who never read a line in their lives."

And now the guests flocked in apace. Carriages came crawling down the hill, or whisking along the level road from the town, until they were packed in the little courtyard by the stable close as mere carts at a fair. The lawn was crowded with people; lovers already wandered in the laurel labyrinth by the foot of the wood. It would seem that everybody of distinction in the neighborhood was there—colonels of militia, captains of volunteers with their ladies, even a colonial bishop in gaiters stooping to play at bowls. Everybody either great or impressive—and yet little Miss Graham's face became anxious as she glanced again toward the gate.

At last there dashed up to the portico a splendid landau drawn by a pair of bays and bearing on the panel a shield the size of a dinner-plate. Its blazonry had often awakened the curiosity and excited the admiration of Babblemouth. It was understood to be quarterly: 1st and 4th az., 3 stags passant ar. for Poltimore, 2nd and 3rd sa., 3 ducks plucked and trussed, or beaked, legged and skewered gules for Briggs. As Mr. Poltimore-Briggs slowly descended and assisted his second wife (the first had been merely Mrs. Poltimore, and passed away before he had assumed the arms and dignity of Briggs) to alight many an eye was turned to look at them. Even the bishop himself stood erect, the bowl poised upon his ten fingers, and suffered a grave smile to suffuse his classic face.

For Mr. Poltimore-Briggs was a man of the finest presence. Six feet tall at least, and proportionately portly and important. And he wore a spacious waistcoat of snowy white and a long, old-fashioned gold chain around his neck, and a broad, blue necktie, with white spots on it, tied in a bow, and shepherd's plaid trousers and gaiters, and the blandest expression that ever veiled a mortal face. He closely followed Mrs. Poltimore-Briggs, who was small, sharp-featured, intrepid in social enterprise, and so truly British that she never knew when she was beaten and never gave up when she was snubbed. And as they threaded their way through the throng of guests, he bowed and nodded upon all sides. For Mr. Poltimore-Briggs was possessed of the most admirable manners—a different manner for each different man—so that toward the great he behaved with deference, and to the lesser folk with a dignity commensurate with his great worth. Close behind them came a young man in tennis flannels and a blazer of blue.

So the Babblemouth people, as she had called them, were come at last. Impatient to watch them upon their way toward her, Miss Graham sat erect upon her throne and her bright eyes sparkled with delight. But the respectful bow and blandishment of Poltimore-Briggs, who called her Helen, and in his most affectionate manner inquired after her health, passed unheeded. The voice of Mrs. Poltimore-Briggs, shrill, in respectful explanation—"It was really so unfortunate, but just as we were ready and the carriage absolutely coming round to the door in came Sir John and, of course, having ridden ten miles, Henry could do no less than"— although audible to the surrounding country, ran on unheard. Miss Graham's eyes and ears and thoughts were all for this young man.

"Graham!" she said, eagerly, holding out both hands. "So you have come back."

"Yes, Aunt Helen. I came down yesterday."

For a full minute she looked at him attentively. "How well you are looking, boy," she cried; and, carried away by an impulse of affection, she placed a hand upon each shoulder and, drawing him down toward her, warmly kissed him upon both cheeks.

The salute was not only unexpected but loud. The young man stood disconcerted, and blushed as if he had been smacked. He had an honest, open face, not over-clever, but fresh with sound health and ruddy from the open air. Then, as he smiled good-humoredly at the absurdity of the situation, a resemblance between himself and his aunt became very noticeable. He had the same frank look, the same gray eyes. His hair, which was clipped quite short, was fair, like the hair in the miniature.

"Sit down. Sit down and tell me about yourself," she commanded in her quick way, pointing to the vacant chair by her side.

He obeyed at once. But his eyes wandered around the garden, narrowly scanning the groups of people, as if in search of some one whom he could not find.

Then she laid her hand upon his arm, and there was a little falter in her voice as she whispered: "But I must not keep you. You have not seen Charity yet. Come back and spend the evening when everybody is gone. There she is—in white—with the bishop—by the rhododendron."

He caught sight of her at last. A glance of understanding, a quick nod of dismissal from his aunt, and he rose and walked hastily across the lawn. She watched him tenderly as he spoke to the girl. And Charity turned and smiled, and looked quite glad. As they slowly strolled away together and disappeared amongst the trees, tears almost filled the little cripple's eyes. It was easy to guess the wish of her life.

But the cloud had risen above the cliff, and now the sunlight faded from the hillside. A sudden gust of wind rushed up the coombe, and set the woods a-rustling with the rumor of a coming storm. Then something struck Miss Graham smartly upon the hand, and she looked down to find that her mitten was quite wet. And the bishop fancied he felt something, too, for he turned his classic shaven face toward heaven to ascertain whether it really rained. There was no room for doubt. A minute later the storm came down in torrents, and a sudden consternation seized the guests.

Poor Miss Graham!

Dowagers from the seats beside the yew hedge set stately sail; old boys came puffing like steam tugs down the gravel paths; and men and maids went tacking in all directions, making for the house, but she sat still.

Mr. Poltimore-Briggs advanced with stately strides to Miss Graham's throne. "My dear Helen," he pleaded, in a tone of deep solicitude, "permit me to offer you an arm."

"No, no, thank you," she replied, impatiently. "Let Sprake bring round my chair. Tell Sprake to bring round my chair."

She was keenly sensitive, and shrank from showing her infirmities. For the world she would not be seen to walk even those few yards. People would pity her, and the thought hurt her pride. But when at last she was solemnly wheeled to the French window, the drawing-room had already filled to overflowing; the hall was crowded, too, and guests stood under the portico disconsolately watching the pelting rain, which pattered down more and more.

The rector and the bishop had fore gathered in the portico. The bishop had but recently returned from abroad, and may be pardoned the perplexity which knit his bushy eyebrows as he looked many years back into the past.

"I—eh—I remember old Dr. Graham. He was a physician at Bath—a rather celebrated man in his day. But I can only recall—if my memory serve me aright—two daughters. One of them our good friend of today, and the other much younger and a very beautiful girl—eh—as was universally admitted. She married Poltimore, much against her father's consent. A sort of—eh—runaway match, in fact, which attracted a great deal of attention at the time. Who, then, is this young lady—this niece whom they call Charity?"

The rector drew closer, as if not caring to be overheard.

"A child whom Miss Graham adopted and brought up. She lives with her as a sort of companion."

"And, eh, no relation?"

MAKING FOR THE HOUSE.

Mere men might laugh to see the heavens play this practical joke. But what can be done with more people than the house can hold? The women understood this and, having shaken the raindrops from their skirts, whispered on all sides with deep feeling: "Poor Miss Graham! Poor Miss Graham!"

The lawn was empty now, suddenly depopulated as a billiard table after an eight stroke. Only two people remained out of doors. Like balls in the same pocket, they waited side by side under shelter of a tree. The white frock of Charity Chance and the flannels of Graham Poltimore stood clearly out from the somber shadows of the copper beech. But the girl was ill at ease. She stepped hastily to the edge of the overhanging branches and glanced up at the sky. A shower of raindrops fell upon her, as leaning forward she struck the slanting leaves with the brim of her broad straw hat. The clouds looked hopeless and heavy as lead, and the storm poured down in torrents. Then she sighed as if she also echoed the sorrow, 'Poor Miss Graham!"

"Dear me, no"—

"She seemed to me a very charming young creature?" interrupted the bishop in a tone of inquiry, as if, on such a matter, his opinion might need corroboration.

"Yes. Yes, she is," replied the rector, briefly, as a matter of fact.

"And are they going to make a match of it?" laughed the bishop, pointing with elderly pleasantry toward the copper beech.

"I fear it is extremely likely. Capital young fellow, Poltimore. Might do a great deal better. Miss Graham has no one else with any claim upon her—no one whatever." Then the rector drew closer still, and his voice sank into a whisper. "It is rather a romantic story. The child was"—

"Charity Chance! Has any one seen Miss Chance? Miss Graham is asking for Miss Chance." It was Theodosia Mortimer who asked, and her voice sounded quite eager.

This inquiry, repeated by every tongue, cut short the rector's tale. The bishop glanced at the weather, stepped with alacrity into the hall and took an umbrella from the stand. Thus equipped he gayly embarked upon his mission. To the admiration of everybody, and the glory of his calves, he positively ran. He placed his paternal arm round her shoulder to hold the umbrella over her head, and thus Charity was conveyed into the house with a tenderness and gallantry very beautiful in gaiters and a shovel hat.

But that was always the way. Strangers who talked to Charity and looked into her frank eyes felt a kindness for the girl.

In the hall she took off her hat, revealing the luxuriant wealth of her rich hair. She laughed to see the people sitting in pairs upon the stairs, as they sometimes do at a dance. But everybody was making merry of the mishap. People made room for her as she pushed her way to the other end of the drawing-room, where the little cripple was now installed. They turned to talk of her when she had passed. An atmosphere of wonder and curiosity surrounded this adopted daughter of the rich Miss Graham. The girl knew this and it made her angry.

"Charity, dear," the lace mittens were raised in a humorous gesture of despair, "we must do something for them. I want you to sing at once, child. But ballads, dear. Something quite simple, that they will all like."

"Home, Sweet Home, I should think," langhed the girl impatiently.

Upon the piano was a volume of Songs of the West, a recent collection of the old ballads of that country, saved by a friendly hand at the last moment ere they sank into oblivion. She had been singing them to please her own fancy. They were quaint, and fragrant of an old world simplicity for which she was always looking and loved. Mrs. Poltimore Briggs, who, by the by, had once been a governess, volunteered to play the accompaniment.

The girl stood by the piano, facing the guests. She was restless and angry. It was a relief to stand up and do something—and she sang her best. She had been well taught, and her voice was low and sweet.

Through the open door it filled the hall with the stairs, and even in the portico they could hear every syllable:

Down in the mead the other day,
As carelessly I went my way,
And plucked flowers red and blue,
I little thought what love could do.

I saw a rose with ruddy blush
And thrust my hand into the bush,
I pricked my fingers to the bone,
I would I'd left that rose alone!

I wish! I wish! but 'tis in vain,
I wish I had my heart again!
With silver chain and diamond locks
I'd fasten it in a golden box.

There is a tender melancholy about these old songs, both in the simple words and melody, which is irresistible and goes straight to the heart. At the first note the conversation sank into a whisper and then died. As Charity finished there was loud applause, and quite a chorus of voices: "If it is not asking too much, Miss Chance. If it is not troubling you, Charity"—

But the girl was as ready to sing as the birds in spring, from mere love of it. And so she went on:

The lily it shall be thy smock,
The jonquil shoe thy feet;
Thy gown shall be the ten-week stock,
To make thee fair and sweet;

until at last the rain had passed over, and again there came a sound of wheels upon the gravel drive. Then Mrs. Poltimore-Briggs was carried away by her lord; the rector's lady went clucking around gathering her daughters under her wing, and they filed off as they had come; the bishop was translated, and the rest went home. But not one failed to congratulate Miss Graham, and pour praises upon Charity Chance. "Thank you so much"—"Such a great treat"—"But I am not sure that the last quite suits you, Charity," put in Theodosia.

"Capital! Very much obliged, Miss Chance. Very much obliged, indeed," blurted the colonel of militia.

"Very charming," smiled the bishop. But then the men admired Charity and meant it.

"Come here, child. Come here," beckoned Miss Graham, when they were all gone. "Sit down on a corner of the footstool. I am proud of you, dear. I am so proud of you."

There was silence for a minute, whilst the long, thin fingers kept stroking the bright hair.

"And is not Graham looking well? Do you know, I think he gets better looking every time he comes down. Not so many freckles—and the mustache improves him, too. But he has such a nice face—an open honest face—an English face."

The little lady brightened with enthusiasm as she pictured it. Then she bent down and kissed the girl's white forehead.

"I asked him to come back by and by."

But Charity did not speak. She knew the inner meaning of all this too well. And although the words were not repeated, every touch, every caress and every smile was only an echo of the familiar phrase: "But you know the wish of my life. You know the one wish of my life."

THE TWO TORNADOES.

BY WOLCOTT CALKINS.

A careful inspection of the desolations left in the track of the recent cyclone in St. Louis has convinced me that it was the precursor in nature of a more serious disaster in the public affairs of this nation. Another tornado has come, and the extent and severity of neither of them can be realized at the East. You must stand in Lafayette Square and count the church buildings on all sides of it in ruins, the iron fence prostrated on one side, the residences unroofed and the trees uprooted or stripped of their branches. You must see the complete sweep made of all the buildings in vast sections of East St. Louis. You must hear witnesses tell of the sudden and awful darkening and rushing wind and of the killing of men before their eyes.

And you must be in the West, also, to get any impression of the new tornado that is sweeping over these States. Resemblances crowd upon me as I attempt the comparison. Its suddenness. Two weeks before the Chicago convention your conservative papers were insisting that if it could be postponed honest money would win. Exactly two weeks before the convention a Methodist minister in St. Louis was one of two orators at a college Commencement. The other was William J. Bryan. The conversation between them was reported to me yesterday.

"Mr. Bryan, have you any hope of a majority for free silver?"

"A week ago I had not the slightest. It begins to look more favorable. We shall make a desperate fight and may win by a bare majority."

Like the atmospheric currents the causes of this political tornado have long been gathering, but they have been invisible and mysterious. The storm has burst in all its fury with little warning. High and low are laid in the dust together by both tornadoes. There was a power house in the track of the storm. Three men were killed by the instant fall of its two lofty chimneys. One is rebuilt and smoking; they are laying the last bricks on the summit of the other as I write. And hard by are tenements of the poor in scattered rubbish; they will be the last to be replaced. And the silver whirlwind has struck the President of the United States, the Supreme Court, the national credit, the banks and all the great enterprises of the country. It is worse than the wind storm, which left out of its track the loftiest buildings of St. Louis. Strong men have trembled while they were telling me that they looked out upon its fury from their offices in the fifteenth story, and knew not what minute the colossal structure would be prostrated. Our greatest political and financial interests lie exactly in the track of the new tornado. But the farmers and the working men will be the worst sufferers and the last to recover.

I have just come from the motley crowd of Populists at their headquarters. They are vociferating in little groups, and you can easily gain access to the center and ask them questions. What are their grievances?

"The gold-bugs of the East! They've got us by the throat. They are ruining us. They are lording it over our great States of the West. Do you suppose we are going to be trodden down by syndicates in New York and Boston?" Of course not, but you want to know what they have done that they should be hated so fiercely.

"Done! Why they've got mortgages on all our farms and railroads and public buildings and schoolhouses and meeting houses. We can't worship God, nor teach our children to spell, nor harvest our corn, nor eat our miserable pittance without having their greedy eyes upon us. Do you suppose we're going to stand that?"

You take a look at their excited faces and clenched fists and don't think they are going to stand it, but express some wonder what they are going to do about it.

"We're going to pay them off in silver dollars. When we borrowed the money a bushel of wheat would pay a dollar of the debt. They shall never get two bushels for one. We'll be fair, but we're bound to be free. Now's our chance."

You keep pressing your questions. Their borrowed money—has it not stocked their farms and broken more acres, so that they raise twice as much wheat as before? Does not one bushel pay for a day's work and buy as much clothing and coffee and agricultural machinery as ever? After all, are not they better off than when they preempted the homestead without a dollar to begin work with? You get wild and conflicting replies until you come to your last word: "My friends, you have your grievances. But you are taking the right way to end them. The atrocious crime of the gold-bugs was to lend you their money. They will never do it again!"

That sobers them. I have never known it to fail. I have seen a crowd of these excited Populists pause and look at one another thoughtfully at this rejoinder. Some of them have the candor to admit that the demolishing of credit by repudiation is not only inevitable, but is the best thing they are aiming at; that it will be the salvation of the farmers to be unable ever to borrow another dollar. Others have Utopian schemes for borrowing of the national Government. But they are all facing the end of the Western mortgage system.

This clearly defined track is the most marvelous resemblance of the two tornadoes. From an elevated point you can trace the exact furrow the wind storm plowed from the southern edge of the city across the river to East St. Louis. And the political storm is plowing one furrow. These Populists have started a dozen, like the graduated income tax, Government ownership of telegraphs and railroads and granger legislation. You don't hear any vociferation about these issues. You hear no more about bimetallism. The silver storm alone is howling wherever I have been in Illinois, in Missouri and in Kansas.

Tornadoes hustle men out of their places very swiftly sometimes. On that awful evening in May a barber was in the midst of his work. He had prepared the face of his client, and stepped to the other side of the room to put an edge upon his razor. When he returned his man had disappeared and a goat was sitting in the chair! Who will be in places of honor and responsibility when this storm is passed? I am not making any comparison of the men of stainless private character and most religious scruples who have been nominated for our highest office. Such an odious personality is as far as possible from my thought. I have in mind presidents of banks, managers of manufactories and controllers of our industrial enterprises. What sort of competence for such responsibilities can be expected from the men who are raising this storm? The goat in that chair is the man who imagines that a depraved currency will bring prosperity to farmers and working men at the expense of creditors who can afford to settle at fifty cents on the dollar.

The danger is tremendous. I have never heard Eastern men speak of it as solemnly as Western men who are sound for honest money. In a doubtful State, like Missouri, with heavy probabilities against gold, the excitement is indescribable. Nothing else is talked of. It gets into prayer meetings and Sunday services. The moral questions at issue are beyond all others. In our Congregational churches here and in Kansas I have not met one silver man, and I am told there will be very few. But the pastor of another denomination tells me that his congregation, composed exclusively of men on salaries and wages, are for silver to a man, and that he himself is in doubt.

This ought to be the greatest educational campaign in our history, not excepting that of 1860. A more complex problem is to be solved, and the ignorance of the people about its very axioms is almost incredible. A committee has already been appointed in one town in Arkansas to secure a fair division of the "free silver" which is soon to be distributed by the Government! To enlighten the deluded minds and to straighten the twisted consciences of discouraged millions will require an unpartisan and thorough campaign of instruction. Why not put such men into the field as Archbishop Ireland and Cyrus Northrup? The sober second thought of the people must be set upon honesty for its own sake and as our only escape from the tornado.

St. Louis, July 22.

THE TOTAL ECLIPSE OF THE SUN, AUG. 8, 9.

BY CHARLES A. BACON.

An enterprising Britisher has figured out that a person would have to wait 10,000 years or more before his locality would be visited by a total solar eclipse, and it may be that the hundreds who will visit the vicinity of the North Cape on the occasion of the total solar eclipse of Aug 8, 9 are actuated by economic motives.

There are perhaps three ways in which an eclipse may be regarded. The stay-at-home computer, with tables of constants and logarithms, determines years in advance at just what second the shadow-cone of the moon, whose size he has reckoned, will strike our spinning earth, and announces that the beginning of the eclipse takes place at sunrise for a certain latitude and longitude, and proceeds to plot on a chart the somewhat irregular path of the tip of the shadow cone, which is less than 200 miles in diameter where the earth cuts through, and which seems to show a willful perversity in selecting its path in the South Pacific or the interior of the least inhabited continent.

Quite different is the program of the tourist or amateur who resorts to the land of the Midnight Sun. In addition to several parties who have gone in private steam yachts from England and America—like that of Sir George Baden-Powell, for instance, who has gone to Nova Zembla—the British Astronomical Association sends out a party of professionals and amateurs who have chartered the Norse King, a yachting steamer of over 3,000 tons, which will be fitted throughout for the special use of the party, including photographic dark-rooms for the immediate development of negatives. They will coast along the west coast of Norway, making stops here and there, and intersperse views of the fiords with the astronomical lectures of Sir Robert Ball. Their objective point is Vadsö, a fishing town of 1,700 inhabitants, of which about one-half are Finns, situated on the Veranger Fiord; several Lapp settlements are in the vicinity, and it was near this spot that Pater Hell of Vienna observed the transit of Venus in 1768.

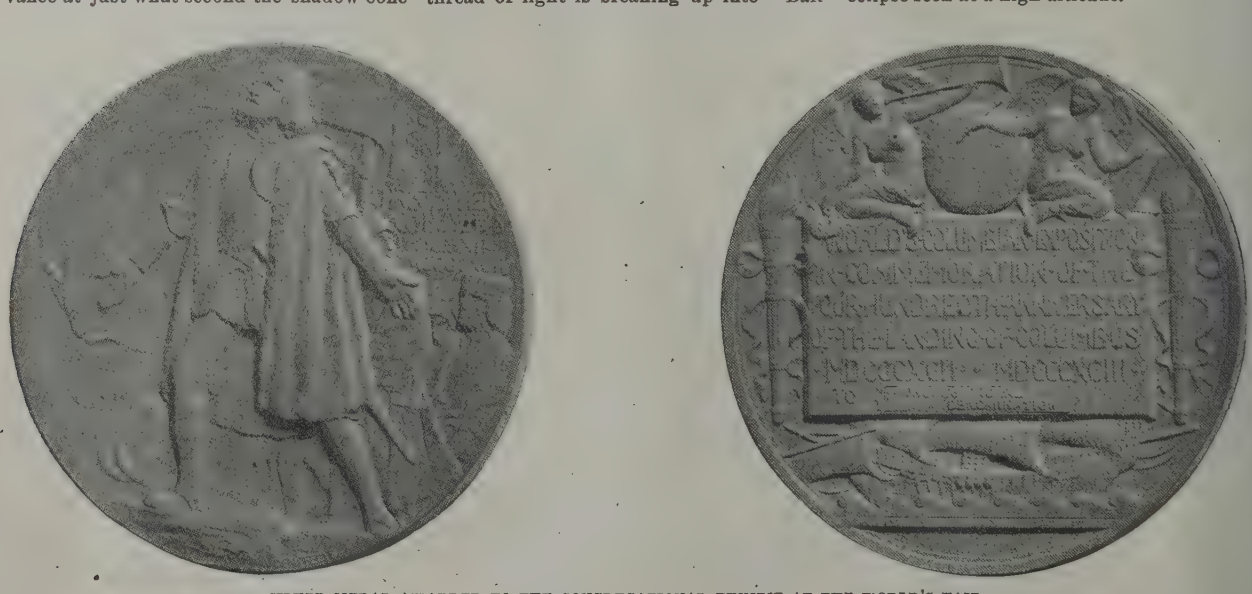
A large American party, for which the arrangements were made by the late Dr. Thomas of Philadelphia, sailed from New York on June 27 on the steamer Ohio, with a more varied itinerary, including the most of the "top of Europe," from Spitzbergen to Russia. Their astronomers will have previously been disembarked at Bodö, the residence of the amtmann, or governor, a week before the eclipse, and the remainder of the party will return to witness the grandest natural display one can ever see.

A spectator at Bodö, where from the top of the Löbsaas a full sweep of the western sea horizon can be had, would wish for eyes in the side as well as the front of his head, for as he watches the bright crescent grows steadily smaller in the northeast, while about him it has been growing darker and colder; at the instant when the last thread of light is breaking up into "Bailly's beads," and birds are going to bed, the black shadow cone can be seen advancing with ominous speed high in air toward the west, and an instant later it strikes the earth, and the path of totality sweeps over the Loffoden Islands, blotting them from sight; a few seconds more and the terrible shadow, moving faster than a mile per second, surrounds him; all is dark; the stars appear, and Venus, Mercury and Jupiter all shine out within a few diameters' distance of the intensely black disc hanging in the heavens, surrounded by the brilliant fantastic solar prominence "flames" and bathed in the shadowy silver light of the mysterious corona, invisible at all other times, and stretching out for hundreds of thousands of miles.

This is the long-awaited opportunity of the third class of those interested—the professional astronomers who have traveled hundreds and perhaps thousands of miles for the precious 106 seconds of totality; who cannot spare an instant for the weirdness of all about—the altered faces of their companions or the terror of animals—as coolly as if at home, where they have been practicing for days and weeks, they make as many exposures as possible to photograph the inner and outer corona, make naked eye drawings of the same, for a photographic eye is not the same as a human one, and try once more to solve the conundrum of the spectrum of the corona, which contains one line unlike anything in the rest of the heavens above, or the earth beneath, or the waters under the earth.

Meantime, in the mountains of northern Japan, Professor Todd of Amherst, with his private party, and Professor Schaeberle of Lick Observatory and others are awaiting the coming of the shadow, which has been steadily traveling towards them for over four hours across the wilds of northern Russia, the steppes of Siberia, and the disputed territory in China.

The main work of all parties will be to study the structure of the inner and outer corona, which never appears twice alike; yet Professor Hale, the indefatigable and resourceful director of the new Yerkes Observatory, is now at work on a method by which he hopes the corona may be studied, though not seen or photographed, in bright sunshine without an eclipse; it may be safely asserted, however, that no method will ever equal the advantages of a total eclipse seen at a high altitude.



SILVER MEDAL AWARDED TO THE CONGREGATIONAL EXHIBIT AT THE WORLD'S FAIR.

Pilgrimage Letters.

In Boston and Lincoln.

I think it was Coleridge who, when asked which of Shakespeare's plays was the best, replied, "The one you read last." The same principle applies to the places we are visiting on this marvelous pilgrimage. Every night we exclaim, "Surely, nothing can exceed today's experience," but the next morning we fare forth to new scenes equally inspiring. If our halt in a given city is for only a few hours, its hospitable citizens contrive to condense the enjoyment of days into that brief time. This was notably the case at Boston, which Baedeker styles as "perhaps chiefly interesting from its association with its famous namesake on the other side of the Atlantic." But we found it a spot of genuinely intrinsic interest and in few places have we been more profoundly stirred by associations with our early history.

OLD BOSTON.

We have now become so accustomed to distinction that it no longer takes away our breath to be met at the station by civic and ecclesiastical dignitaries and carried off in triumph to Guildhalls and cathedrals. Nevertheless, "custom does not stale" nor time "wither the infinite variety" of either their welcome or our pleasure in being received. Enthusiasm, therefore, was quite at concert pitch when Rev. D. Barnet and others of the Free Churches greeted us as we stepped, at high noon, from the railway carriages, and escorted us to the Peacock and Royal Hotel, where the mayor, the vicar and other friends joined us at the substantial luncheon spread by mine host of this old tavern. For a wonder we had eaten only one breakfast since rising, consequently we were in prime condition to do justice to the tempting viands. The addresses which followed from Mayor Clarke, J. W. Smith, representing the Nonconformist churches, and the vicar, Rev. J. Stephenson, were more than ordinarily cordial, and both Dr. Dunning and Hon. J. A. Lane made felicitous responses. These agreeable functions over the party proceeded to St. Botolph, the beautiful parish church, and when we reached the chancel all joined in singing the familiar hymn,

O God, our help in ages past, and in repeating the Lord's Prayer, led by the vicar. The focus of interest, however, was the Cotton Chapel, which has been restored by New England Bostonians in memory of John Cotton, who, when appointed vicar, was told by the Bishop of Lincoln that he was "a young man and unfit to be over such a factious people who were imbued with the Puritan spirit." How little the bishop dreamed that the youth would subsequently become famous as a Puritan of the Puritans! Mr. G. S. W. Jebb, author of a delightful history of the church, explained its chief features and a copy of the book was presented to each of the party. A hurried visit followed to the old Guildhall, and we were deeply impressed as we stood in the ancient courtroom where Brewster and his companions were tried; also when we descended the narrow stairway down which the Pilgrims were conducted into the dark cells underneath, where they were confined by English magistrates for attempting to leave their country after they had been harried out of it! Only two of these gruesome chambers now remain. A mild sensation was created when our esteemed "lineal descendant," Dr. Robinson, was thrust into one of them by the military member of our party, General Wheeler, but his period of incarceration was not long. What a contrast was our official welcome to this same city! It brought to mind Dr. Dunning's apt remark at the luncheon: "Our fathers found it rather difficult to get away from Boston, and in view of the kindness you have shown us we are very much afraid that you are planning to make it equally hard for us."

As we were whirled off to Lincoln at the end of three and a half hours, we wondered if we could possibly absorb any more enjoyment that day. But the greeting at the station by Rev. J. D. Jones, the able pastor of the Newland Church, was irresistible, and after dinner we all promptly appeared at the County Assembly rooms for another demonstration fully equal to anything lavished upon us elsewhere. The mayor, Councilor E. Harrison, in the full splendor of his official robes, with the mayoress, ministers of all denominations and prominent citizens, making a total of over 300 persons, gathered in the handsomely decorated rooms for the usual round of speech-making, interspersed with music, refreshments and that social intercourse which has given us such favorable opportunities for becoming better acquainted with our English cousins. A fine large engraving of the Departure of the Pilgrims was placed among the flags and flowers. The formal address of welcome, read by Rev. Z. Robinson in behalf of the Lincoln Free Church Council, was inscribed on vellum, richly bound in morocco leather, and bore the city arms with the motto Floreat Lindum. This beautiful souvenir will undoubtedly be placed on exhibition in the Congregational Library at Boston. The elegance of all its appointments and the high social standing of many of the guests mark this entertainment as among the finest arranged in our honor. An amusing little episode was when the mayor's chamberlain, an important functionary in a red coat with gilt buttons, who presented the guests as they entered, rapped us to order in the middle of the evening, ascended the platform and solemnly called out, "I claim your silence and attention." We supposed this was the herald for something quite extraordinary and were rather taken aback when he held up to view a lost fan and asked for the owner.

LINCOLN CATHEDRAL.

Sunday mercifully intervened before another week of social excitement, but two of the party, Rev. Messrs. Soule and Leete, preached in Lincoln pulpits, while Rev. L. L. Wirt was in great demand for Sunday school addresses. As loyal Congregationalists we have made it a point—and considered it a privilege—to attend Nonconformist churches in the morning. In the afternoon we have generally worshiped in the cathedrals. This happened to be Coronation Sunday, and the anthem appropriate to the day was a notable feature of the evening service. As a few of us lingered to enjoy the magnificent organ music at the close there transpired another of those pleasant surprises which have marked this trip from the outset. The Sub-Dean, who had previously sent us his card with the offer of any courtesy in his power, came forward and hospitably urged our going to the deanery close by to see the commanding view from the hill, on which portions of an old Roman wall are still in a good state of preservation. He then took us into the house, and again we had a glimpse of a lovely English home, with its indescribable air of repose and cultivation. Our host manifested especial pride in calling attention to the old gallery staircase running around three sides of the entrance hall, also to the carved bookcase in the library which he had had made to order when a student at Oriel College, Oxford. As we entered the drawing-room an elderly lady of sweet and gracious mien advanced from a recessed window, the very place, she told us, where Bishop Paley was accustomed to sit when writing his Evidences of Christianity. A pleasure analogous to this was a visit Monday morning to the elegant home of Joseph Ruston, a former M. P., who has a superb private art gallery, rich in paintings of the Rosetti school, which was freely opened for our inspection.

The Monday morning service at the cathedral included a most intelligent rendering of Mendelssohn's "If with all your hearts," by tenor solo and chorus, which was greatly enjoyed by the Pilgrims, on account of whose presence the anthem had been selected. After the service we examined in detail the unsurpassed beauties of the majestic edifice under the scholarly guidance of the Sub-Dean. Not the least valued feature of the morning was the hour spent in the library with the cathedral librarian. F. J. D.

THE NATION.

BY CLINTON SCOLLARD.

Set, sovereign wise, between the unchanging seas,
  Where hath man seen, in any buried age,
  A broader, brighter, grander heritage
Than here, where Freedom's banner greets the breeze?
One land from the remote Floridian keys
  To where Superior spreads its mighty page;
  One land from where the Atlantic rollers rage
To where the calm Pacific lies at ease!

Shall we who through long travail won the hight
  Descend to infamous depths too base to name?
Besmirch our honor in the whole world's sight,
  And darken evermore our vaunted fame?
Rouse, freemen, in your immemorial might,
  And save the nation from the brand of shame!

Two trains on the Pennsylvania and Reading Railroads—roads admirably equipped with all mechanical devices for rendering collisions impossible—came together near Atlantic City, N. J., July 30, and forty-four passengers on the excursion train from Bridgeton and Salem, N. J., were killed and forty-three injured. Apparently the engineer of the Reading train, killed in the collision, was responsible for this most dreadful accident of its kind in the history of the State.

A SUNDAY IN GLASGOW.

BY S. E. BRIDGMAN.

The sturdy clergy of Scotland, from the days of the Covenanters down to Chalmers, and even to the present time, have stamped their lives upon the generations. We have had recently the privilege of hearing Dr. James Stalker, one of Scotland's greatest preachers, loved and honored in our land as well as in his own city, where for nine years he has preached to the congregation at "St. Matthew's," the membership of the church numbering 1,100. He adheres, as many of his associates, to the old-fashioned style of preaching in the morning and in the afternoon at two o'clock, and always to large congregations. "And why is this," we asked the Doctor. His reply gives an insight into Scotch homes in which the young are brought up to reverence the Sabbath. "We like," said he, "to have the evening of the holy day one emphatically for our families. In the long twilights our children become the world to us. Music, story, song, the sweet and tender intercourse between young and old, with all the sacredness of the day woven in, give a special charm to home life. A good deal has been said by writers of a certain type of the gloominess of such a mode of spending the Sabbath. On the other hand, Dr. Paton says, 'Eleven of us were brought up in a Christian home where Sabbath evenings were spent with the catechism and a rehearsal of what the church had given them through the day, and not one was ever heard, or ever will be heard, saying that the Sabbath was dull or wearisome,' and that is my experience and observation," added Dr. Stalker. The testimony of Carlyle, of Principal Cairns, whose intensely interesting life has just been given to the world by Rev. Dr. MacEwen, is to the same point.

Dr. Stalker's Lives of Christ and St. Paul have been published in the Norwegian, Swedish, Bulgarian, German, Spanish, Chinese and Japanese languages, while all his books are eagerly welcomed. He has just completed a series of ten Sabbath addresses to young men on Religious Psychology. We heard the ninth in the series on The Will. It was clear, direct and forcible. For nine years at the weekly evening service he has been giving an exposition of the Psalms from the first to the 150th. "How would you Americans stand that?" the Doctor jokingly asked. "Yet our people take it all in, and others outside come to us every Wednesday night and would not allow me to break the series till the end of the Psalms was reached."

When the text was announced on Sabbath morning the rustle all over the house showed that the people were determined to read it for themselves. The large choir are seated on a raised platform under the pulpit. They are volunteers and all professing Christians. No organ or musical instrument of man's make is employed, but the great audience sings with an earnestness and devotion in keeping with the strength and fervor of their ancestors, young and old heartily joining in the service of song. The leader always has in special training 150 or so, who may be depended on at any time.

Dr. Stalker is well beloved by his people. There is a heartiness, a life in the service really exhilarating. Perhaps the glory of springtime, the pink and white hedgerows of hawthorn and the rich foliage may have imparted to preacher and hearer its gladness. In the opening prayer of the Sabbath service Dr. Stalker thanked God for the joy of living, for the joys of home, the happiness of thinking, for the sweetness of human friendship, for souls quick to help and sympathize, even for the freight of joy which the deepest sorrow may yield after the storm of agony and pain.

St. Matthew's Church sustains, in addition to the pastor, two associates and a missionary helper, who carry on a daily service in another part of the city in addition to modern methods of work. Rev. John Watson (Ian Maclaren) was formerly an associate pastor of Dr. Stalker's church. He now has one of the largest and richest churches in England.

"Go early, if you would secure a seat in my neighbor John Hunter's church," said Dr. Stalker. We found a printed notice saying, "Strangers not admitted till the bell stops ringing. Pew holders seated first." Through the courtesy of the sexton we were not kept outside. At the stated time the already well filled edifice received large additions from outsiders. Dr. Hunter, although a Congregationalist, adheres to a liturgical form of worship prepared by himself, and uses his own hymn-book. His manner is quiet but intense. He made few gestures, but with folded hands made their slight movement the sign of a pent-up force within. He had but a single illustration, which by its aptness caused a smile to ripple over the faces, especially of the young people. His church membership is about 1,000.

We have been specially interested in looking over the work of the sustentation fund of the Free Church of Scotland. This originated with Dr. Chalmers fifty years ago, and is a wonderful help to the church. By it over a thousand pastors are kept absolutely free from all anxiety as to their support. Each man receives through it an assured salary of $800 yearly. To this each congregation adds such sums as it pleases. There is no endowment, but every year the necessary sum is subscribed by the churches. Dr. Chalmers was far sighted. When the disruption of the Established Church took place, and the Free Church came out, hundreds of pastors found themselves without support. The Doctor called for one penny a week from every church member, poor or rich. Of course the latter gave largely and generously in addition. The income of the Free Church of Scotland for the year closing March 31 for this fund alone amounted to some $900,000, while the whole sum contributed for various purposes—building, educational, missions, widows and orphans—amounted to $3,500,000, a large increase over the previous year.

In a large photograph of the 400 that, led by Dr. Chalmers, came out half a century ago from the Established Church, we were impressed with the dignity expressed in the faces of such men as Hugh Miller, Drs. Duff, Macleod and others famed far and wide in the theological world. Their successors of today are men of might and mark.

Recent seismic phenomena in the Orient caused not only the awful tidal wave, which engulfed the towns of northern Japan, causing the death of 30,000 persons, but another which swept along the Chinese coast of the Yellow Sea and caused the death of 4,000 persons there.

A SUMMER HYMN.

BY CAROLINE F. DOLE.

O God, how beautiful art thou,
Beyond our utmost thought!
The painting of this sunset sky
Is by thy finger wrought.

What glories of the land and sea,
Of vale and mountain hight,
Dost thou with lavish hand display,
Thy children to delight.

The drifting of the summer cloud,
Touched with the sunbeam bright;
The rosy morn and fading day,
And starry host of night.

All of thy wondrous power and skill
Daily and hourly speak;
But of thy goodness and thy love,
How poor our speech, and weak!

"'Tis very good for strength to know that some one needs you to be strong," says Mrs. Browning, and the idea is capable of almost indefinite enlargement. For instance, it develops honor in children to know that parents expect them to be true and upright. Even quite young children can grasp this truth. A wayward little fellow who was prone to snatch forbidden articles when his mother left the room was indifferent to threats or punishment. One day the mother appealed to his honor by saying, "I am going away now and I can trust you to do just the same as if I were here." Something in the childish heart responded and a life-long impression for good was made. As the child grew to boyhood, and even after entering college, the consciousness that his mother trusted him was a safeguard against temptation and an incentive to noble living. Do we avail ourselves as often as we might of the power which inheres in this sort of stimulus?

There are those who maintain that in proportion as young women enter into business or professional life the love of home is weakened, and if they marry they are sure to make poor wives. Not infrequently, however, the experience of earning her own living operates just the other way. It opens a girl's eyes to the blessings and privileges she has enjoyed under the parental roof, and if ever she has a home of her own she sacrifices for its interests more cheerfully from knowing, by her own exertions, how much they cost. One of this class said recently: "The struggle for self-support revealed to me, as nothing else could, what heavy burdens business men carry. I know now what a tremendous strain is upon my husband day after day. There is never a moment when he can lay aside the weighty responsibility laid upon him, and I make an intelligent, as well as a strenuous, effort to have the home a real haven of rest when he comes home at night." Women who truly love their husbands do not always have this sympathetic insight, and through carelessness or ignorance make unnecessary demands upon powers already strained to the utmost.

"The pursuit of the dollar" is nowhere so difficult or so perplexing as in our country homes, where wives and daughters often have more comforts than ready cash. In Mr. Buckham's article are suggested some possible ways by which girls living in the country may earn money. It should be said, however, that without business knowledge and business tact even special opportunities count for little, and that energy, perseverance and executive ability are essential in any successful business enterprise whatever. On the negative side, the side of using money wisely to make it go as far as possible, most girls have had some training, but how many have served an apprenticeship upon the positive side, the side of keeping accounts and being on the lookout for business opportunities? Let the girls who read this article remember that modern business is not a matter of impulse, but of close study and calculation, and form the habit of mind which alone makes success possible, and let them not expect, in the competition into which they enter, special consideration and privileges on account of their sex. Self-respect requires that what girls earn they should earn of right and not of pity.

THOSE WHO HAVE MISSED LIFE'S HIGHEST GOOD.

BY MRS. MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

There are always those who feel in their moments of introspection that they have missed life's highest good. At a certain point in the pathway they hesitated, or they loitered, or they took a wrong turning, or they made a mistake, and they were never able to retrace, or retrieve, or alter results in any subsequent day. Or, when it would have been within their power to go forward and grasp what seemed to them life's crown of beauty and glory, they were held back by circumstance, by duty to some dear dependent one, by poverty, by ill health, by one of a thousand providential hindrances. However it happened the fact remains that men and women must often acknowledge, somewhat sadly, that the day of highest fruition will never dawn again for them; that to face defeat and accept disappointment without complaint and with cheerful acquiescence is their only wisdom, perhaps their beautiful heroism, though this is left for others to say.

It is quite possible to have missed life's highest good, and to know and grieve over the lack before God and one's conscience, while to the world one seems to have climbed the hights and arrived at the ultimate successes. Looking at this friend with her children growing up to honor and usefulness, the childless woman can scarce forbear a bitter pang, though, like Hannah of old, she may possess the loyal devotion of a husband who is ready to exclaim with Elkanah, "Am I not better to thee than ten sons?" Not always is the draught of even worthy fame sweet to the palate; it is seldom without its drop of bitterness in the thought of how much has been foregone that the fame, or what that stands for, might be earned.

People of every station and degree have their own standards, and success is comparative. Measuring by the distance beyond us we often are aware of failure where we appear to be victorious, and as the only graduating line worth using is that which measures upward, not downward, this must always be the case. A woman, gently bred and highly educated, was lately visiting a younger friend. With tears in her eyes, as she left the friend's home, she said, "You are what I once hoped and meant to be." In her case prolonged invalidism and absence from centers of study had prevented development in certain coveted directions. Life's highest good, as she saw it, had eluded her, and she could not suppress the little moan.

We clasp hands on the road with this or that comrade, who greets us cheerily and fares onward with valiant heart, yet who is never quite what he or she would have been had life yielded the one dearly desired complementary love, which was not to be granted. One knows, one cannot help knowing, that the denied companionship would have meant added strength where now is often weakness, clearer vision where is sometimes blindness, joy and gladness where are now loneliness and a sense of deprivation. The loved who could not love us, the loved whom we might not claim, the loved whose duties led them otherwhere, the loved who died and left us, the loved whom in our spirit's ken we saw but never found on earth—is it not because of them, or for want of them, that some of us have missed life's highest good?

Yet even so, Father, we say, and go on with our work, giving to the larger circle in liberal bestowment what else had been poured on the smaller, doing the will of God in little sacrifices and unheroic, petty self-denials, smoothing the rough way for our fellow-pilgrims, alleviating the pains of the sick, helping the children. Do thy work is the imperative need of the hour for any who has missed life's best attainment. So shall he not be dowered with second best, but instead receive from the hand of the Lord something better worth having than this world can ever bestow.

MONEY-MAKING FOR COUNTRY GIRLS.

BY JAMES BUCKHAM.

On a hot, dry, dusty summer day the express train upon which I was a passenger stopped at a little country station in New Hampshire that the engine might take on water. The car wheels had hardly ceased rolling when a young girl came shyly along the platform to the window where I sat, carrying in her hands a huge pitcher of iced lemonade. Her little sister followed with a tray of glasses.

"Please, sir," said the girl, "won't you try my lemonade? It's only five cents a glass."

The bright face of the little merchant and the huge pitcher, beaded with coolness, were not to be resisted. I bought and drank two glasses of what seemed to me that sweltering day the most delicious nectar I ever tasted. Quickly down the platform moved the little maidens, trying hard to keep pace with the invitations, "Here, little girls! This way with that lemonade!" Long before the train started the gallon pitcher was empty, and a score of thirsty people were lamenting their failure to secure a glass of the refreshing beverage.

"Bring a hogshead of it next time, little girl!" cried a jolly old gentleman, who had succeeded in buying the very last half glass. And with smiles and nods from the grateful passengers the train rolled away.

The incident set me to thinking. I have often heard it said that girls in the country have little or no chance to make money, and here was at least one practical refutation of the statement. All summer long, I have no doubt, the young lemonade venders at that wayside station drove a thriving trade. Their product was in unlimited demand, and there was no competition. Those are economic conditions which you do not often find in the city!

Thousands of young girls, scattered through the small country towns and villages of America, are daily pondering the question how, without leaving home, or neglecting their customary duties, they can earn a little money for books, for clothing, for musical or artistic culture, for legitimate recreation, for the help of their parents, for a score of worthy purposes. Most of them fail to find a way simply, I believe, for the reason that they do not discover the real opportunities open to them. This little New Hampshire girl, who thought of lemonade in connection with the thirsty passengers on the afternoon express train, was a born financier. She got hold of something new, something which every other girl was not trying, Perhaps some girl, who is rightly situated, will try the lemonade plan in her vicinity. That is one good, and not over-worked, thing certainly. But there are other ways quite as good. Let me indicate a few.

If you have studied botany to any extent, you have learned that there are many plants, growing wild, that have medicinal properties. It is chiefly from these plants that the patent medicines are made whose sales are so enormous. The manufacturing druggists must have these wild roots and barks and leaves, and they must have them in immense quantities. Somebody in the country must gather them and prepare them for use. Why not the girls on the farms? If you will get from your local druggist the address of some large firm of manufacturing druggists, and will write to them for a list and description of the herbs, roots, etc., used by them, with directions for curing and shipping, you will receive a prompt and willing reply; for it is to the advantage of these firms to keep in touch with herb-gatherers all over the country, in order that their supply of material may never run short, and may reach them in the freshest and most reliable condition. Country girls will be surprised and delighted to find from the market price-lists and instructions of manufacturing and wholesale druggists that they can realize a neat sum, every summer season, by picking and drying herbs. And there is no place in the world quite equal to the old fashioned country garret for curing "simples."

Closely in line with herb picking is herb growing. Take sage, for example. Sage needs to be comparatively fresh in order that its medicinal properties may have their best effect. There is a steady demand for it at all drug stores each season. Your own druggist needs a considerable quantity. If you raise it and dry it properly, he will probably be only too glad to patronize this worthy home industry. The wholesale druggists will tell you of a dozen herbs, or more, that you can raise for them in quantities. There is always plenty of land that a farmer's girl can have for her herb garden, and by giving your leisure hours to its cultivation you can easily make between one and two hundred dollars a year.

When winter comes the country girl is not necessarily deprived of opportunities for making money. If she knows how to knit she can earn many a dollar knitting woolen socks and mittens, for which there is an inexhaustible demand. "Home-knit" goods are always at a premium in the city stores. The cheap, machine-made imitations are shunned by all who know the virtues of the genuine home made article. If a country girl lives within a hundred miles of a large city and knows how to make superior bread, one might almost say that her fortune is as good as made. Every loaf she bakes is worth fifteen cents in a city bakery, and the patrons of the bakery will gladly pay the extra five cents to get an article which is actually "domestic"—a moist, firm, "nutty" bread, compared with which the tasteless chalk and wool of commerce is an abomination. A cent and a half, or two cents, per loaf is a fair baker's commission, and transportation will eat up another two cents. But a net receipt of eleven cents a loaf makes a splendid profit on the investment.

Other ways of money-making for country girls might be suggested were space available. But enough have been mentioned to show the kind of product that pays best—something staple, in a word—something that people always want, and want in large quantities. The trouble with most girls who try to earn money is that they offer something which is a drug in the market. They try to write poems or stories; they go out canvassing for articles that everybody has in the house; they want to teach, when there are already so many in this field that wages are less than those paid to an indifferent cook. What they need to learn is to offer something that the world will not be obliged to take grumblingly, if at all, for politeness or charity's sake—something that the world is eager to get, and for which it will thank them most sincerely. A little careful study of one's tastes and opportunities will generally suggest the production of something for which there is a demand. And the native resources of the country are so great—so much greater than those of the city—that the country girl ought always to find sufficient time, material and appliance to make her independent work successful.

HERB YARROW.

Everywhere the yarrow grows!
Here and there the thistle blows,
Here and there the barberries,
By the brook the plumy fern;
We know where the lily is,
Where the dear wild roses burn;
But the yarrow everywhere
Wanders on the common air.

No one need to search for thee;
Even now thy leaf I see
Peeping o'er my opened book,
Throwing so fair a shadow down,
So perfect, that I can but look,
And, looking, find new wonder crown
The bliss of beauty which before
Taught my spirit to adore.

In thy bitter odors blent
Health we find, not discontent;
In thy name a tender grief
For that love once drowned in Yarrow,
Stream that never gave relief
To the faithful "winsome marrow."
Bitter Yarrow! Flowing Yarrow!
Still lament thy winsome marrow!

Emblem of our equal land,
Where men and women helpful stand,
And love and labor, high and low;
Type of the low! Thou lovely plant!
Teach the proud-hearted how to know
The sacred worth of nature's grant,
The strength of bitterness, and the sweet
Humility of beauty's feet.

HOW TO KEEP A COMMONPLACE BOOK.

BY MERAB MITCHELL.

Very different was our Miss Kitty from the Miss Kitty in Lob-lie by-the-Fire, "who was a woman of sentiment and kept a commonplace book"; for, although the idea of the books was undoubtedly the same, our Miss Kitty was one of those good, plain, comfortable women without one shred of sentiment but with plenty of common sense, a thorough housekeeper and home maker. To ask her a question on any household difficulty was to get in return not only a straightforward answer but a delightful chat on the subject, and so, when I discovered that she kept a commonplace book and was allowed to see it, I knew that I had found a treasure worthy to serve as a model to young housekeepers.

The book itself should be of moderate size, with a good binding and not too thick paper. If it has not a pocket make a cover which will form one on the inside, as it will prove convenient to hold clippings or notes until you wish to enter them in the book. Many times it will be best to paste the cutting into the book instead of to re-copy. It should be divided into compartments, which will obviate the necessity of an index.

Miss Kitty began hers with the kitchen. In this department she entered all sorts of odd suggestions for kitchen use that did not necessarily belong in the cook-book, such as ideas for comfortable kitchen furniture, what should be kept in the table drawer, receipts for stove polish, for keeping the tins bright, for hanging kitchen towels, and a hundred little odds and ends picked up from the home corner in her paper, or from friends. She always slipped these clippings into the pocket until tried; then, if good, into their proper department in the book.

The laundry came next, with all sorts of advice on how to wash doubtful goods, to iron silk, to make starch, etc. The pantry and broom closet formed another department. In this were receipts for cleaning silver, glass, brass, steel, gilt and china; also washes for mattings, oilcloth and polish for hardwood floors, the care of brooms, etc.

The medicine chest contained directions for the treatment of burns, cuts, sunburn, freckles, and sundry minor ills common in every household. The sewing-room department told how to clean rusty needles and care for scissors, also had minute directions for cutting and fitting garments, just how to measure and where to take in and let out. No wonder Miss Kitty's dresses and sacques always fit so nicely. Then followed a few illustrations and directions cut from magazines and papers of how to make bows or to run a drawstring, examples of feather-stitching, directions for stocking knitting and darning. Hints on the care of gloves, shoes and wearing apparel also came under this head. Naturally fancy work was included. Another department had full directions for all sorts of entertainment—for instance, how to prepare for a peanut party or a cobweb party, a magic lantern evening, a rainbow bazar, and so on, including an "Easter Day," with full directions for coloring eggs, and an Halloween mystery and May Day outing; what to do and take on picnics. Last of all came traveling suggestions as to dress, bags and conveniences.

Of course every housekeeper will have her own idea on the subject and arrange to put into the book that which is best suited to her own particular requirements, but certainly there could not be a more useful gift that an invalid sister or friend could make so easily and that a young housekeeper would appreciate more thoroughly than this commonplace book.

ABOUT PEOPLE.

In telling the story of her friendship with Oliver Wendell Holmes, Mrs. Phelps Ward declares that for so merry a man his sense of the universal misery was extraordinary. He once said to her: "Outside I laugh. Inside I never laugh. It is impossible. The world is too sad."

A writer, who gives in McClure's some reminiscences of Kipling in India, says that he always conceived his verses as a tune, often with a remarkably musical rhythm, and when once this took possession of him "the words and rhyme came as readily as when a singer vamps his own banjo accompaniment."

A Washington girl, Miss Marguerite McDonald, though only sixteen years old, is one of the cleverest designers of paper dolls in this country. As a child she showed great artistic ability in making paper dolls, and when only thirteen some of her productions came to the notice of a large art-publishing firm, who promptly made her an offer for original designs, and the little girl found that her play had become profitable.

Any fresh information about George Washington is eagerly welcomed, and it is especially interesting to learn of a new fact through the editor of an English publication who has been looking up the genealogy of the father of our country. It seems that he was of noble blood, having descended in direct line from John Baliol, the founder of Baliol College, Oxford, grandfather of the John Baliol who for a time reigned king of Scotland.

Mr. Longfellow was fond of Italians and was specially gratified by the love and honor accorded him in Italy. A letter from an Italian admirer addressed to "Mr. Greatest Poet Longfellow" amused him greatly. It distressed him to refuse the cross of San Lazzaro, the Italian literary decoration, which was offered him by the king of Italy, but, though no man was ever less a bigot in things civil or religious than he, he said firmly: "Of course, as a republican and a Protestant, I can't accept a decoration from a Catholic prince."

Writing in The Atlantic, Mrs. Fields describes Harriet Beecher Stowe as a small woman with pretty curling hair and far-away dreaming eyes, and declares that she has received scant justice and no mercy at the hand of the photographer. Mrs. Stowe said herself, during her triumphal visit to England, after the publication of Uncle Tom's Cabin: "The general topic of remark on meeting me seems to be that I am not so bad looking as they were afraid I was; and I do assure you, when I have seen the things in the shop windows here with my name under them, I have been lost in wondering imagination at the boundless loving-kindness of my English and Scottish friends in keeping up such a warm heart for such a Gorgon."

W. D. Howells, in his delightful paper in the current Harper's on The White Mr. Longfellow, speaks of the poet as the finest artist of all his gifted contemporaries, yet he says Mr. Longfellow was the most perfectly modest man he ever saw, ever imagined; that he was patient of all things and gentle beyond all mere gentlemanliness. Like Phillips Brooks he never denied himself to those who came to his door, and when asked if he were not much interrupted said, with a faint sigh, not more than was good for him, he fancied; if it were not for interruptions he might overwork. His generosity in the matter of autographs is well known, but we are glad to read that, when requested to furnish fifty signatures, he refused the lady who wished to offer them as a novel attraction to her guests at a lunch party.

THE ART OF LIVING TOGETHER.

In his suggestive little book having this title, Dr. R. F. Horton devotes a chapter to the art of living together in circumstances over which we have no control, and he mentions two laws for practical conduct—the Law of Caution and the Law of Kindness. Regarding the first of these he says:

When you find yourself obliged to live with any person, man or woman, you should lose no time in taking careful soundings and marking the chart. No good can come of it unless you know the coast line pretty well. As a picturesque object in the southern sea, with fronds of palm and volcanic mountains that gleam purple and gold in the glory of sunset or the clearing of the rain, this individual may be surveyed with a wide berth and enjoyed. But to live together is another matter. It involves coasting around, riding at anchor, occasionally landing. An unseen shoal may be as fatal as a threatening jut of pointed rock. With every person some topics are dangerous and should be avoided, for few people are without a touch of monomania. In the chart these should be as quickly as possible marked. Strange to say, religion, which should be the bond of peace, is frequently one of the dangerous topics. Perhaps this explains why we can seldom deal wisely in religious matters with those under our own roof. Generally speaking our religion is best shown by words to strangers and chance acquaintances, but by our lives to those who are always with us.

After dwelling on the Law of Kindness, which Mr. Horton says has two tables, Thou shalt not be unkind and Thou shalt be kind, this author says:

It will require much self-control to avoid unkindness toward those with whom we live for an obvious reason. We are like floes of ice on a Canadian river, grinding and crashing against one another by the mere force of the tide. If you give yourself free play in any house, you will be crushing and grinding against some one almost at once without knowing it. You must keep your own unruly personality well in hand, that it may not at any point go plunging and colliding against those around you. Your opinions need not be expressed, if they wound, unless there is a practical question at issue. Your sufferings are to be borne, not paraded.

The first commandment in the second table of the law is, "Without waiting for opportunities of great kindness thou shalt set about little kindnesses forthwith." I have known some people happily ingenious in these small services of life. They use their brains in doing a kindness. They give little presents that have an exaggerated attraction because they are just what you want. They say the right word—just what every one would say—only they say it at the right time. They have a promptness of manner which forestalls your comfort and helps you without any burdensome reminder that the help is given. Watching these genial and attractive people, I have often fallen into despair about myself, for all this seems like a natural gift, like music or poetry. But I have some reason to think that it is toilsomely acquired in the accustomed places—the oratory at the foot of the cross and the cave under the hilltop of duty.

One of the saddest domestic features of the day is the disrepute into which housekeeping has fallen, for that is a woman's first natural duty and answers to the needs of her best nature. It is by no means necessary that she should be a Cinderella among the ashes, or a Nausicaa washing linen, or a Penelope forever at her needle, but all women of intelligence now understand that good cooking is a liberal science, and that there is a most intimate connection between food and virtue, and food and health, and food and thought.—Amelia E. Barr.

Closet and Altar

Let prayer be the key of the morning and the bolt of the evening.

Even if, in the midst of an avalanche of work, God calls you "apart into a desert place to rest awhile," and even if the desert means only a headache, or a rainy day, make no complaint but follow close.—Anna L. Waring.

The greatest prayer is patience.—Buddha.

Then first do we attain to the fullness of God's love as his children when it is no longer happiness or misery, prosperity or adversity, that draws us to him or keeps us back from him. What we should then experience none can utter; but it would be something far better than when we were burning with the first flame of love, and had great emotion but less true submission; for here, though there may be less show of zeal and less vehemence of feeling, there is more true faithfulness to God.—John Tauler.

I would have gone; God bade me stay;
I would have worked; God bade me rest.
He broke my will from day to day;
He read my yearnings unexpressed,
And said me nay.

Now I would stay; God bids me go:
Now I would rest; God bids me work.
He breaks my heart tossed to and fro;
My soul is wrung with doubts that lurk
And vex it so!

I go, Lord, where thou sendest me;
Day after day I plod and moil;
But, Christ my Lord, when will it be
That I may let alone my toil
And rest with thee?

—Christina Rossetti.

Patience is endurance in waiting at the call of God. "In your patience ye shall win your souls," said our Lord to his disciples as he foretold their trial. Patient, hopeful waiting is hard work, when it is the only work possible to us in an emergency. But patient waiting is in its time the highest duty of a faithful soul.—H. Clay Trumbull.

Father of all grace and patience, who hast known our hearts from the beginning, keep them to the end that we fail not through lack of endurance in the quiet hours of life. When action ceases and we can only wait, when decision gives place to doubt, when weakness or ignorance leave room only for submission, when we have spoken our last word, made our final effort, and in our own strength can do no more; then, for the sake of Jesus who was tempted with our temptations and straitened in lingering days until his work might be accomplished, come thou to our aid! Assure us of thy presence when we sit in loneliness, that our vexed hearts may find their rest in thee. Speak the words in our perplexity which of old upon the lips of Christ brought calm to the troubled sea. Turn even our impatience to profit in the deepening of a purpose that is not dependent upon immediate attainment, and a faith that lays hold upon the eternal purposes of God. And when, by thine assistance, we have been enabled to keep the word of thy patience, suffer us not to fall away in the hour of death, for the sake of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Mothers in Council.

A BIT OF CHILD STUDY.

Rob is a fair-haired, blue-eyed boy of four; Mab a black-eyed little maiden of three. They are inseparable friends and companions; healthy, happy and frolicsome, but not at all precocious. The stories they have heard have been mainly founded upon matters of daily experience, with the exception of the rhymes of Mother Goose and other nursery tales of a simple nature. A short time ago, however, their father conceived the idea that a further awakening of the imagination was desirable. He began a course of training in this direction by reading to the children one evening, after they had been put to bed, the story of Little Thumb as told in Andrew Lang's Blue Fairy Book. The conception of a father and mother who would deliberately lose their children in a wood, and leave them to be devoured by wolves and bears, was entirely new to the children. By experience and training they had been taught to think of a parent as the embodiment of love and watchfulness, many of the kindergarten songs and stories developing this idea. As a consequence they were greatly shocked and impressed by the cruelty of the deed. Indeed, their father was somewhat startled by the result of his experiment, and tried successfully to dodge a repetition of the tale, for which the children begged with great eagerness on several successive evenings.

Meanwhile, their mother noticed in their daily play constant references to bears, to the little children who were lost in the woods and the "naughty papa and mamma." As the idea grew in familiarity they embodied the story in their games, personating first the bears, "who were going to eat the little children all up," then the poor little children, "who were all lost." The former personation was extremely realistic, the children going on all fours, growling fiercely and seizing their mother's dress with their teeth until forbidden to do so. It is a curious fact that the escape of the children seemed to make no impression upon them, though it had been dwelt upon at the time the story was told and afterward. Three or four days passed, and one evening when the children had been left alone to go to sleep their mother overheard this conversation:

Rob: "Our baby is a dear baby, isn't he?"

Mab: "Yes, he is."

Rob: "He doesn't knock down our block houses, does he?"

Mab: But sometimes we build houses for him to knock down."

Rob: "Yes, but he doesn't knock down houses when we don't want him to. If he did, what then?"

Mab: "Then we'd throw him away in a wood."

Rob: "And the bears would eat him all up, wouldn't they?"

Mab: "Yes, they would."

Rob: "And we'd get a better baby."

Mab: "Then we'd never see him any more."

There was silence for a moment and Rob's heart evidently relented at the thought of losing the little brother to whom he is devotedly attached. At length he said: "Well, if he knocks down our houses I guess we'd better whip him first, that would be better, and not send him off to the woods to the bears."

Many random remarks followed, showing that the lively imaginations of the children were busy with the newly-formed conceptions which they had received of unnatural parents and fierce beasts of prey. The semi-darkness of the nursery became peopled with fancied terrors, and a frightened outcry for "mamma" finally resulted.

As these children have been accustomed from infancy to going to sleep in a darkened room, and as their treatment of the baby has hitherto been gentle, their unusual timidity and the proposed punishment of the little brother may both be directly traced to the story of Little Thumb. Yet this is a comparatively simple illustration of a class of stories frequently told in our nurseries. Is it not possible that much of the so-called "natural cruelty of childhood" may be the result of poison injected into the mind during the most plastic period of development? Reasoning logically, what must be the effect upon the fresh imagination of a child of such nursery classics as Blue Beard and Jack the Giant-killer? Yet the careful mother who will shield her children from every physical ill will carelessly expose them to a moral and intellectual contagion which is far worse. Leaving entirely out of account the deliberate terrorizing of their wide-eyed charges on the part of ruthless nursemaids, the imagination of the average child is constantly subjected to undue stimulation. His natural and healthful interest in all that is new and wonderful becomes converted into a morbid taste for the abnormally exciting and horrible.

Life is short, the power of the individual mind is limited, and it is a question whether, as a result of the present agitation in regard to primary education, the teachers and mothers of the future may not discard much of the fiction upon which our children are now fed, substituting in its place science studies, bits of biography and snatches of history told in a manner as absorbingly interesting as the most charming of fairy tales.

DOROTHEA BIRD.

I CAN'T HELP IT.

We frequently hear these words uttered as an excuse for conduct that is unpraiseworthy, if not positively wicked. It is a common expression on the lips of children when reproved for wrongdoing, and is too often used by older people in justification of over-indulgence, impatience, anger or resentment.

"I can't help it if it does make me sick. I want this and I am going to eat it."

"I can't help it; when any one talks to me like that it makes me mad."

"I know I ought not to feel this way or that, but I can't help it."

I wonder if those who use this expression often, or hear it on the lips of their children, realize the gravity of the situation. What does it indicate but a lack of the fundamental principle of true manhood and womanhood—self-control. Of course it is not to be expected that the child will possess it in a very marked degree, but it is one object of education to develop this quality.

According to the United States census in 1890, there were 82,329 prisoners confined in our prisons, jails, houses of correction and insane asylums. Dr. Frederick H. Wines, in a recent lecture before the Harvard students on the Problem of Crime, comprehended all these, together with idiots, under the term "degenerates." "Self-control," he said, "is the principle of progress and the test of manhood. All degenerates are deficient in this power. The criminal is not necessarily one who has greater temptations than other men, but one who has less power of resistance, less self-control." Probably most of our 82,329 prisoners are the kind of people who "can't help it."

Dr. Wines, who speaks from an extensive and accurate knowledge of his subject, says that comparatively few criminals come from families where there is a large number of children. The majority have no brothers or sisters. This seems a startling statement, but the explanation of the fact will readily suggest itself to any thoughtful mind, and is one worthy of consideration. The only child is likely to be over-indulged, and therefore to have less opportunity to learn self-control. The boy or girl who mingles freely with other children in the home or school is generally obliged to acquire a measure of self-control. If his parents do not teach it to him, his playmates are likely to do so. He soon learns that the lack of it deprives him of their approbation and consequently of the good time he desires.

"He struck me and I couldn't help striking back," the boy says, with an air of conscious pride. The mother might reply: "Yes, no doubt it was the easiest thing to do, but it is a great deal braver to do the hard thing, control yourself and not strike back. I am sorry my boy wasn't strong enough for that."

Many a boy hates to be thought weak who does not so much mind being considered wicked. He needs to learn that weakness and wickedness are twin brothers; that the "I can't help it" spirit belongs to the idiot and the criminal. E. T.

The Conversation Corner.

THE picture I have ordered the Despotic Foreman to insert for our Corner picture this week is not a "prize photograph," although it was a prize to me when I found it in the dear old town of the hill country, from which I showed you a home picture last week. Isn't it a pretty bit of farm life? The farmer did not know that I got possession of the picture, although I talked with him at the old homestead where he had lived all his life, and where his father and grandfather had lived before him. In fact, I believe he did not know that his daughter—who was on her vacation visit to the home town and accompanied her father one morning—took it as a happy snap shot with her kodak!

The farmer's ancestral farm sloped down towards the river which flowed through the valley and emptied into the larger stream that the Indians called in their own dialect "the long river," near the famous falls where in King Philip's war the Indians were surprised in camp and driven over the falls. But besides the meadow land and the tillage land—the maple orchard which in my boyhood seemed to me the most profitable part of the farm, especially in the month of April, has disappeared—there is an ample pasture lot back on the hillside, perhaps a mile or two away. Up there once a week the farmer goes to salt his cattle—I wonder if some of our elderly Corner readers do not remember going with their fathers on the same pleasant errand. The sheep are enjoying the salt where the farmer has scattered it, and his favorite heifer is lapping the basket.

Did I hear some of you "guessing" the farmer's age? He said he was eighty-two, but I did not think he could be so old. Afterwards I looked in the old family Bible and found the date where his father had written it down, 1814. It must be true that the honest, wholesome life of the country tends to vigorous old age. Boys who have happy homes on the farm and opportunity to work there still, with fair returns, ought to consider carefully before exchanging them for the more uncertain life of the city. Many a merchant or lawyer or editor would like to go back to the simpler, healthier life of the country, if they knew enough to get a living there!

Speaking of old age, I have just received a letter from a reader in the hill country of Vermont, who says that his certificate as an honorary member reached him on his ninety-eighth birthday. He says:

I wonder if you have any members of your Corner who have lived more years than I have; if so, I would like to know of them.

G. U.

On the other hand, a little girl in Maine writes to ask how I knew to send her certificate on her sixth birthday. Of course, I did not know anything about it in either case—it was just a coincidence. Here is a letter from a Green Mountain member not quite as old as Mr. U.:

BARTON, VT.

Dear Mr. Martin: I would like very much to be a Cornerer. I am seven years old and I have a little borther three years old. I have a tricycle and like to ride it very much. My grandpa has a large field of strawberries and I help him some about picking.

CLEMMER S.

The way he spells his brother reminds me of a picture I recently saw on exhibition. It was an old anti-slavery picture of a fugitive slave, with this inscription: "Am I not a man and a brother?" The gentleman who loaned it said that when a boy he erased the second letter in the last word, so that it read: "Am I not a man and a bother?" (This was supposed to be the boy's feeling about the trouble of having so many runaway slaves around, the father's house being a well-known station on the "underground railroad.") So you see how much difference the change of a single letter makes. I would like to ask Clemmer if it is "half as hard again" to learn to ride on a tricycle as on a bicycle?

This conundrum reminds me that I have another from a little boy in Maine:

CHERRYFIELD, ME.

Dear Mr. Martin: I am nine years old. I go to school. I have a little pony. And two cats and two kittens. They are very playful and cunning. I have got a velocipede. I go to ride with my pony about every pleasant day. I wish to put a puzzle in the Corner. What coat is finished without buttons and put on wet? Answer: A coat of paint.

ARTHUR H.

Perhaps Arthur did not mean to have me put in the answer now, but I fear I shall forget it afterwards—as I have in case of one printed June 18—"Why is an elephant like a wheelbarrow?" Here is one boy's answer.

SAUGUS, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: Saturday some of us were up on Round Hill after some stones, and I found some jasper. After it has laid in the sun a long time it will be white on the outside and red inside. I send you one jasper. I am twelve years old. When I was looking for gypsy moth [Corner, June 18] I saw that the woodpecker has an appetite for the gypsy moth. I think the answer to that conundrum was that the elephant carries a trunk.

LAWRENCE S.

So said a boy in Worcester I called upon the other day, but the girl that sent me the conundrum gave this answer: "Because neither of them can climb a tree." But some Concord boys who have just called upon me say that it is not fair to have an answer like that; they might as well ask why—I cannot remember their illustrations! Here is another "cunnin-drum":

WINCHESTER, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: I think I will write you a puzzle. "Though I dance at a ball, I am nothing at all." It is a shadow. The one who takes care of us while mamma is away was making a cake and she put a cupful of salt instead of sugar she meant to put in. She thought it was horrible! ESTHER P.

One cupful instead of another cupful makes as much a difference as a change of a letter in a word. Better give the salt to the sheep and the sugar to the children who eat cake!

Mr. Martin

CORNER SCRAP-BOOK.

Abigail Adams. The Scrap-book of June 18, to which references are made in the preceding columns, had a note about that woman, in whose memory a cairn was to be erected at Quincy by the Daughters of the Revolution. She is the only woman in our history who has been the wife of one president and the mother of another. A Weymouth (Mass.) Cornerer sends a paper containing a Children's Day sermon, by the pastor of the Old North Church in that town, upon Abigail Adams, who was the daughter of Rev. William Smith, an early pastor of the church. One remarkable thing he mentions about her is that she never went to school—there were no girls' colleges then! But she was acquainted with the poets, learned French and some Latin, and knew how to write very excellent letters. She knew how to work, too, and was not ashamed, when the wife of the President of the United States, to skim her milk and make butter. It is said that she directed the making of the ice cream at General Washington's inaugural dinner, which was the first recorded occasion in which that foreign luxury was used in this country. She herself was the first lady to preside at the White House. She was diligent in business, and stood before kings—when her husband was ambassador to the court of St. James.

About Measures. An English magazine says that Sir Robert Rawlinson has recently called attention to the use of the half-penny in surveying work. The ha'penny is exactly one inch in diameter, and was originally made of that size for convenience as a standard of measure. The same paragraph says that a postage stamp (English) is an inch high, including the perforation. I do not think this is quite exact, as I find by measurement that the ordinary "2 1-2d." stamp is, like our two-cent stamp, seven-eighths of an inch, although if the perforations at both ends are included the statement may be true. A foot was originally the length of a man's foot. An inch (Latin, uncia, a twelfth) is the twelfth part of a foot, as ounce is the twelfth part of a pound. Compare also the old measures, the ell and the cubit, which represent the length of the fore-arm, and fathom, which is the length of the outstretched arms. Put this note in your Scrap-book, and write a composition next winter on The Origin of Weights and Measures.

The Russian Balloon. Keep on the watch for it this summer. The grown-up children of northern Russia and Siberia are asked to watch for it too. The Russian Geographical Society has issued a leaflet and distributed it all over that region, telling about Dr. Andree's balloon and asking the people to take care of the balloonists. This is the style of the appeal:

Three men who know a great deal will go up into the clouds, next summer, to get some more knowledge. They will be in a basket that is fastened to a great big bladder filled with a sort of air that puffs it out. This is a balloon and will look like picture No. 1. It won't hurt anybody. Look at picture No. 2 and see the people running to it when it comes down to the ground. They wouldn't run to it if it was anything to be afraid of, so nobody should be scared if they see the balloon. Neither should they be afraid of the three men in the balloon. They are good men and everybody should help them. It will be pleasing to God and the czar if those who see these men are kind to them, and give them food and take them to the nearest officials, and the king of Sweden will reward the good deed.

Would it not be a grand thing if the czar—who is a kind of magnified Despotic Foreman of all the Russias—should, instead of oppressing his people and keeping them in servitude and ignorance, provide schools for them, so that they would not need to be treated like little children when he addresses them a message?

LESSON FOR AUG. 16. Ps. 32: 1-11.

DAVID'S CONFESSION AND FORGIVENESS.

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D. D.

The Thirty-second Psalm is the second of the seven penitential Psalms. It is by its title ascribed to David. It has been generally believed to have been written by him after his public confession of his adultery with Bathsheba and murder of her husband. It thus becomes the noble part of a very ignoble experience. In nothing does David's greatness appear more exalted than in his penitence when no human power could punish him. No period of his history is more sadly and intensely interesting than this, because no other so closely reflects the Christian's experience of the curse of a guilty conscience and the relief of assured forgiveness after frank confession and full purpose to obey God. In five steps as here recorded we may trace the tragedy of the sin-burdened soul and its deliverance through the abounding grace of God.

I. Sin concealed [vs. 3, 4]. The first two verses express the general truth for which the Psalm was written. Then the concrete illustration begins. No experience makes one grow old so fast as struggling to keep down the voice of conscience. The sinner's mind and moral sense become disordered. His inward discontent makes his very bones wax old. The delicate machinery of his being, unoiled by trust or hope, grinds itself away. "His moisture is changed as with the drought." David, no doubt, put to himself the strongest arguments in his own behalf. Was he not the king? Had he not the right to do as he pleased with his subjects? Did not Uriah bring on himself his death? Did not other kings do the same things? But all this was only "roaring all the day long."

His concealed sin was not only making him miserable but was inflicting terrible sufferings on others. One who is angry with his better self is always dangerous to others. Probably the siege of Rabbah took place while David was in this condition [2 Sam. 12: 29-31]. One who is at peace with God would not put men to torture by saws and harrows and axes. A man who has wronged his keen conscience is a terror in a place of power. If David had not repented he might have become another Herod. If Judas had not hanged himself he might have murdered whole communities. Whoever fights his conscience puts many in peril.

II. Sin confessed and forgiven [v. 5]. David saw and coveted what he had no right to possess. So far he had wronged only himself and God. Had he then repented he ought to have confessed in secret only. But he took what he coveted, wronged others, caused the death of a faithful subject and risked the safety of his nation that he might hide his crime. Then his guilt was made known. After his first yielding to temptation every step in wickedness was a vain effort to recover what he had lost, and every step brought a keener consciousness that by it he had made his loss the greater. Confession to God and to those who were suffering from his evil deeds might have saved him at any point in his downward career. But at every step confession became more difficult, because it involved greater shame. Whoever has begun willfully to do wrong must face this fact—there is no alternative to confession except sinking deeper into sin and dragging more people down till confession becomes impossible.

David's first sense of relief must have been felt when he ceased his useless efforts to hide his guilt. Joab knew his secret. Nathan knew it. It was known to the people about the palace. Yet he had been for months trying to hide his real character and deceiving himself. Often men who have given themselves up after long efforts to conceal their crimes have declared their sense of relief from the nameless dread of discovery when the worst has already happened.

But the real relief came from the assurance of God's forgiveness. The awful barrier between David and God was at last removed. David had stopped lying about his sin. He had told the truth to God, who had accepted this evidence of his better purpose and received him again into favor. Punishment from man was a light thing, now that he could talk freely to God as his child. The sweetest experience in a sinner's life is the consciousness of being restored to God's favor following frank confession.

III. Mercy to the penitent [vs. 6, 7]. The Psalmist has learned by his experience of sin and forgiveness two things that the repentant sinner may appropriate, and these he utters in his song.

1. New confidence in prayer. Every offending saint "in the time of finding out sin" [R. V. margin] may pray to God. Men may not believe in his repentance. Those whom he has wronged may despise him, and he may be so humiliated as to feel that their aversion is deserved. But God will not turn away from him. "Let him pray," said David, "God will hear."

2. A hiding place from sin. No one can fully escape the consequences of his own evildoing. The wrong he has done to others will bring accusers who will harass him. The sins he has committed have made avenues through which temptations that once had little power may now assault him. He will never be the man he might have been. But if he can come to God without fear, he can take the sting from complaints against himself for what he cannot remedy, for he can confidently ask God for help. He can also escape from temptations, for when they assail him he will cling close to God.

IV. Counsel to the sinner [vs. 8, 9]. David, having told what had befallen him, says to those who are tempted, "I will counsel you" His advice is commonplace enough in itself, but it gains force because its meaning has been discovered by disregarding it. Be not perverse like a mule, who can understand only the compulsion of bit and bridle. Such a willful following after sin, from which nothing but force can hold men back, brings sorrows only and brings them in floods. Trust the Lord. Confess and renounce your sin as I have done, and as mercy has compassed me about with songs of deliverance, so it shall compass you. This is the teaching of one man's experience by which others may profit.

V. Counsel to the righteous. A sinner forgiven may congratulate those who cannot enter into his peculiar experience by which his joy is tempered by sorrow. For he is joyous notwithstanding his sin, and he cannot begin to tell of it without breaking forth in praise: "Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered." But the climax of his song is for those who have continued faithful to God, shadowed by no shame of guilt:

Be glad in the Lord and rejoice, ye righteous:
And shout for joy, all ye that are upright in heart.

PROGRESS OF THE KINGDOM.

FOREIGN MISSIONS AFTER A CENTURY.

(Parallel with The Congregationalist's September Topic for Missionary Meetings.)

Anniversaries in the life of foreign missionary societies are of the same value as in the case of an individual. They serve as vantage points from which to survey the aims and efforts, the triumphs and failures of the past, to face anew the problems and conflicts of the present as well as the opportunities and ideals of the future. In 1892 the whole Christian world, to a certain extent, joined with English Baptists in celebrating the hundredth anniversary of the organization, through William Carey's efforts, of the first modern British missionary society. The great English Congregational missionary organization, the London Missionary Society, had its centenary last year; the Church Missionary Society has already set on foot a "three years' enterprise" to signalize its hundredth anniversary in 1899; and before many years our own American Board, which was organized in 1810, will have rounded out its first century of existence.

In view of the activity of the church in organizing missionary societies; in view, too, of the opening up of the world to the entrance of the missionary and of the shelter and support afforded him by means of the great colonization movements; in view, again, of the enormous increase in Bible translation and distribution and the remarkable development of the missionary plant, evangelistic, educational, literary, medical and industrial—no wonder the past one hundred years have been characterized as "a century of missions."

This era has been, first of all, one of missionary organization. A hundred years ago the churches generally were just awakening to the needs of the heathen world, the professedly Christian governments and officials of the world withstood missions, the press and the literary men of the time scoffed at them or abstained from recognizing and encouraging the extension of Christianity. Nevertheless, though in conditions almost as unfavorable at home as abroad, where the doors of nearly every pagan nation were closed to the gospel, Christian England was beginning to be stirred with the enthusiasm of the great missionary revival which began with William Carey. By 1796 two missionary societies had been formed in England and a score or more of missionaries sent out. Contrast these small beginnings with the statistics of missionary enterprise in the world of today—our 220 independent foreign missionary societies, with their 5,000 principal stations and nearly 19,000 out-stations, their 11,579 missionaries and more than 70,000 native workers—and we gain some idea of the vastness and importance of one of the most significant movements of modern religious history. One hundred years ago all the evangelical converts in the non-Christian world numbered but a few hundreds; now the enrolled number of communicants is 1,157,668. The English Baptist Society received in its first year $415; last year the reported receipts of all missionary societies were in round numbers $14,441,000, of which $5,006,000 came from the United States alone, while the native Christians in mission churches connected with American societies contributed the noble sum of $590,000.

An important factor in the great missionary enterprise and one of the chief triumphs of the nineteenth century is the extent of Bible translation and circulation. "To the open world the open Bible is now being sent," some one has well said. The British and Foreign Bible Society was organized in 1804, the American Bible Society in 1816, and the number of similar organizations has grown to eighty. During the present century alone the Word of God has been translated into 250 languages—five times as many as during the preceding eighteen—and 350,000,000 copies and portions have been issued in nearly 400 tongues. These comprise the languages and dialects of nine-tenths of the human race. Last year more copies of the Scriptures were sent into circulation than existed in the whole world at the beginning of the century.

The rapid and unprecedented changes in the moral, social and political world have, in the providence of God, exerted an almost incalculable influence upon the progress of Christian missions. At the beginning of the century at least a thousand million souls were, with scattered exceptions, inaccessible to the Christian missionary. Japan had banished Roman Catholic missions as early as 1614, and closed its doors to all foreigners; in India as late as 1812 all Christian teaching was forbidden; China, Siam, Burmah, Korea were also inaccessible. The islands of the Pacific were known only through the discoveries of adventurous navigators, and their inhabitants were so savage that death was the penalty for landing on their shores. Madagascar was a nation of fierce idolaters, and the great interior regions of Africa were unexplored and unknown, while even a large part of Christendom itself—the Roman Catholic countries—was closed against the entrance of the gospel.

But this century has witnessed a marvelous growth in civil and religious liberty. It has seen the abolition of slavery, the conquest of India, the opening up of China and Japan, and the rise of the latter to a rank among the great Powers of the world, the world-wide expansion of British colonies, the rediscovery of Africa and its partition among the European Powers. Contrast the conditions of missionary effort a century ago with the present abounding opportunities of the Christian Church throughout the world. Emigration, colonization, exploration, commerce have drawn the alien nations and peoples together. Modern facilities of travel, of postal and telegraphic communication, of international comity, of financial exchange render inestimable service in promoting missions, and science, literature and philanthropy have had their share in the progress of the kingdom.

We have indicated some of the sharp contrasts between the non-Christian world of a century ago and the same countries today as to political and social affairs, educational and moral development, and we can only suggest the desirability of tracing the evolution of the missionary from the untrained, uneducated peasants and artisans who constituted the bulk of those sent out in the early part of this century to the wise, talented, finely-educated professional men—ministers, physicians, college professors—who represent Christianity today on the foreign field. Women's missionary organizations and all the efforts of women for their sisters of other races, the elevation and education of women in pagan lands during the century, would form a very suggestive topic of special study. Another way of taking up a single phase of this vast subject would be to select a certain country and picture the difference between the dawn and the close of the nineteenth century. See how, for instance, in India, infanticide and suttecism have been prohibited; government support withdrawn from idolatry; caste, to some extent at least, broken down; schools, colleges and hospitals have sprung up; churches and converts have multiplied, and heathenism is everywhere on the wane.

But what changes, we ask, has the century wrought upon the heathen religions and what place shall Christianity occupy in the future? In his magnificent chapter entitled The Spiritual Expansion of Christendom in Modern Missions of the East, Rev. E. A. Lawrence convinces his readers of the disintegration of heathenism, declaring that "every heathen state (with the solitary exception of China) either crumbles or is swept into the general current of Christendom; every heathen society is in process of disorganization and transformation; every non-Christian religion is in part simply dissolving away, in part reorganizing itself into a new existence." He goes on to say: "The one universal opportunity of the Christian era has dawned upon us. The precise hour for universal mission activity has struck. Every door swings open—physical, political, mental and spiritual. God is the great missionary; Christendom is one vast unconscious missionary society; the missionary church is but one, though the culminating and indispensable, agency." But Mr. Lawrence hastens to point out the dangers of the future, which he characterizes briefly as a scientific heathenism or a heathenized Christianity; the possibility on the one hand that the molten religions of Asia, instead of being caught while in flux and run in Christian molds, should be allowed to stiffen into scientific, national heathenisms and secularisms; or the peril on the other hand of a popular, but nominal and degraded, Christianity. Everything depends upon the Christian Church of today, and upon the expansion and extension of the divine life within the soul and of the soul within the church.

CURRENT HISTORY NOTES.

The excess of expenditures over receipts by the national Treasury during July, the first month of the current fiscal year, was $13,000,000; the national debt increased nearly $11,000,000, and but for the contributions of about $23,000,000 in gold from the national banks during the month the gold reserve would have stood at $87,000 000 July 31.

The men of a Mennonite colony in Indiana, hitherto bound by its creed to abstain from voting, have revised their creed and decided to participate in the coming election.

Cholera is rampant in Egypt and Cuba; and the inhabitants of the southern part of the Indian Territory are threatened with famine and fever caused by prolonged heat, drought and blasting winds.

Russia asked for a loan of $200,000,000 from the French people last week, and it was subscribed twenty times over. New York and Brooklyn asked for bids on new issues of gold bonds last week, and failed to get enough bids to cover one-third of the proposed issues. In ordinary times the credit of American municipalities is as good as Russian credit. These are extraordinary times.

The Federal Treasury officials have compiled a pamphlet of fifty-four pages which will, it is thought, answer all questions, statistical and historical, which the citizens of the country may ask concerning the monetary issue; and it will be sent to all applicants who raise specific queries, with page and paragraph marked which answer the query or queries.

John Morley in the Nineteenth Century urges the British ministry to hasten and make secure the Anglo-American arbitration compact. The Irish Land Bill, with its provisions bettering the lot of the tenants somewhat, passed its third reading in the House of Commons last week, and has passed its second reading in the House of Lords. It would be interesting to know whether the recent report of a royal commission, showing that Great Britain for half a century has been taxing Ireland nearly $14,000,000 a year more than could have justly been demanded, has had any effect in mollifying Ireland's opponents and passing the measure of reform. Irishmen the world over are looking forward with greatest expectation to the conference of Irishmen, representing all lands and factions, to be held in Dublin early in September, where and when it is hoped that ways will be devised to hasten home rule.

Literature

CONCERNING STYLE.

An author's style is weight—or wings. When Henry James speaks of "the confused but comprehensive" work of Browning he is balancing the highest praise for thought against a serious criticism of manner, and one cannot help considering—idle as all such thoughts must be—how great a poet might have spoken in our generation if Browning's comprehensiveness could have been uttered in a style as lucid and with a care as great as that which Dante gave to the Divina Commedia. Why is it that Spenser, with all his wealth of exquisite imagination, is after all only "the poet's poet," whose praise the multitude is quite content to take on trust? It is not the fairy world in which he dwells—that is no more unlike the walks of common life than Prospero's island or the elfin realm of Oberon. It is not carelessness, but too much care—an overwrought and artificial method which robs the scene of its reality and makes us unwillingly drowsy at the last. And so it is with even the redundancies of Shakespeare, which have been meat and drink to the commentators but a sorrow to the lovers of his fame.

One has but to look, therefore, to the present or the past to see how style has aided or hindered great literary reputations. Carelessness leads to forgetfulness, but so also does excess of care, and the danger with writers of our own day lies, we feel, upon the side of artificiality. The fresh note which our authors seek to strike is too often nothing more than the note of affectation, which may for the moment fall with welcome upon the public's jaded ear, but which can bring no lasting music with it. And, if affectation palls, imitation has an even briefer charm. After some writer of real power has gained his vogue a host of imitators follows. They seize upon the artificialities which were clay in the hands of the master—molded as he would to forms of beauty—and stick them, like broken fragments of a temple frieze, upon the mud walls of huts which they would have us think are temples.

A generation of would-be prophets imitated Carlyle to the ruin of their English style, and now another generation of enthusiastic essayists and story-writers is beginning to copy the exquisite artificialities which Stevenson made glow and breathe by the fire of his genius. The note has been struck, and the teasing echoes begin to come from the empty hollows of the rocks. It is a pity that it is so, but we may use our privilege, at least, to warn the younger writers. If you cannot be original, try at least to be yourselves, as God has made you and you have used his gift, for that is, after all, the best originality. If you cannot astonish the world by depth of thought, at least you may, with toil and care and loving self-restraint, tell your thought so clearly that no one can mistake it. And this, when all is said, is the very hight of style and the very inner frame of beauty.

LATIN CHRISTIANITY.

A History of Confession and Indulgences in the Latin Church, by Henry Charles Lea, LL. D. These two learned and comprehensive volumes of research and narration are to be followed by a third devoted to indulgences, as these are devoted to confession and absolution. In order to insure perfect fairness Mr. Lea has referred only to Roman Catholic authorities, so that, his own opinions and conclusions aside, the work can only be controverted by showing either that the quotations lavishly cited from documents and books are falsified or garbled, or that they bear false witness to the practices and opinions of their authors and their age, which would amount to an overturning of the work of all the great Roman Catholic authorities.

To us Mr. Lea seems scrupulously fair and just, and the arraignment of the Roman Catholic system of governing the world through the confessional which grows with his statement of fact is therefore only the more crushing. It is an effective system, as history shows, but effective in making priestcraft an ever present factor in political and family life and crushing that private initiative from which the great advance of civilization must proceed. Let any one read the makeshifts of casuistry, and then consider the instructions in regard to sensual sins which were a part of the priest's training, and some of which are quoted here, in the light of the experience of the race, and ask himself whether such a system can ever be trusted in the relations of men, and especially of men and women. The author has no zeal in bringing out this side of his subject, and spares us much which might be added to confirm the conclusion which the evidence forces upon us, but he has given us quite enough to prove that the enforced confessional is a source of weakness and of peril which can never be readmitted to church life.

We are not surprised to find that Mr. Lea is convinced that religious teaching is not in itself necessarily conducive to public morality, requiring close oversight and discipline for its complete effect. "In fact, religion has much less influence on morals," he says, "at least on that portion of morals which falls under the jurisdiction of the police, than we are in the habit of believing, and our confidence in the ethical benefits derived from Christian teaching is unfortunately not justified by facts" (England being the conspicuous exception in the recent increase of crimes). This the author attributes to the absence of restraint founded upon immediate advantage and penalty, citing the discipline of the Society of Friends and the superior morality of the Protestants of France as instances where a close and perpetual oversight has produced notable good results. This is a plea for the upholding of church and family discipline which we cannot stop to elaborate here.

Mr. Lea's book is monumental in its research and will fully repay careful study. We shall look with much interest to the completion of the series which, together with the earlier series upon the inquisition, must be indispensable to all students of church history. [Lea Bros. & Co. 2 vols. $3.00 each.]

In the series of Present Day Primers Rev. Charles H. H. Wright, D. D., has prepared A Primer of Roman Catholicism, whose purpose is better described in its sub-title, The Doctrines of the Church of Rome briefly examined in the Light of Scripture. Dr. Wright properly begins with the rule of faith as contained in the decrees of the Council of Trent and the catechism of Pius V., with the more recent additions of Pius IX. and the Vatican Council. In the presence of an active and sometimes not over-scrupulous papal propaganda such a handbook as this is useful. Its facsimiles of indulgences, medals and the like, whose existence is pushed into the background by controversialists and historians who write with a Roman bias, will be helpful. The book is distinctly controversial, but is written by a scholar of competent equipment, and attempts to be fair in most of its statements of papal acts and accepted Roman Catholic doctrines. [Fleming H. Revell Co. 40 cents.]

LITERARY STUDIES.

The Epic of the Fall of Man, a comparative study of Cædmon, Dante and Milton, by S. Humphreys Gurteen, LL. D. A careful study and comparison of the two great English Christian poets make up the bulk of this handsome volume. Mr. Gurteen was a pupil of Masson and comes by his thoroughgoing literary study and his enthusiasm for Milton naturally. In many points, however, he places Cædmon above him as a poetic interpreter of the story of the angels' fall and man's disobedience. He has given us a smooth and sympathetic translation of the Anglo Saxon epic, which he appends to a critical discussion in which large quotations have already been made.

He makes it clear throughout this latter not only that Milton followed very closely in the track of his predecessor, but that they both used the prevalent thought of the Northern and Anglo-Saxon race in enlargement of the brief Scripture narrative, so illustrating again the fact that the greatest poets are the mouthpieces of their generation. How completely this legend (if we may call it so without making anybody think that we are referring to the Scripture story and not to the popular and poetic conclusions therefrom) has taken possession of the Northern and Puritan mind any one may prove to his satisfaction by reading again what the Bible says about the fall of man and the rebellion of the angels, and comparing it with the poetic superstructure which the popular imagination and the art of the poets has added to it.

To the study of these two English poets, Cædmon and Milton, a sketch of the cosmogony and picture of hell as drawn by Dante is added. Dante and Milton have often been compared and contrasted, and Mr. Gurteen has nothing very new to add at this point, but his comparison of the "three poetic hells" is interesting and essential to the completion of his task.

The illustrations of the book are reproductions of the illuminations in the one important surviving manuscript of Cædmon's epic and woodcuts illustrative of the cosmological notions underlying the poems. The former especially are extremely good. But why did the author, or the publishers, allow so careful and scholarly a book to go out without an index? [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50]

TRAVEL.

A Parisian in America, by S. C. de Soissons. This is an amusing book and not lacking in suggestiveness for Americans who may wish to see themselves through the eyes of an intelligent Frenchman. It is true that we discover after a while that we are laughing partly at, as well as with, the author, whose Parisian airs and graces, hasty judgments and general air of condescending interest do not make us value all his opinions highly. Nevertheless it would be a mistake to be deceived by his manner and to think that he does not have keen eyes for our national qualities as well as for our frivolities, and the interest he feels, however hidden under a careless mask, is usually for the higher life of men. The chapter on Protestantism is the most serious in the book and is well worth considering. In it he says that the Congregational Church "is to be considered as the national American church," and he seems to have felt the influence of New England very strongly in his travels and studies of our life. It is as a book of bright and sometimes witty sketches, therefore, and only now and then of careful studies, that the book must take its place among books of travel in America. [Estes & Lauriat. $1.25.]

At Hawarden with Mr. Gladstone gives the title to a book of seven papers of British travel by William H. Rideing. The enjoyable glimpse of England's greatest statesman in his home at Hawarden emphasizes the kindliness and modesty of the "Grand Old Man." The description of Quaint Old Yarmouth and the life of its fishermen is full of interest; the trip on "the Wild Irishman," the mail express which cuts its way through Penmaenmawr in its rush from London to Holyhead, is delightful; while the wonderful advance which a quarter of a century has made in ocean travel is forcibly put in Old and New on the Atlantic. Altogether the book is well worth reading. [T. Y. Crowell & Co. $1.50.]

STORIES.

Jersey Street and Jersey Lane contains six of the late H. C. Bunner's inimitable sketches. His delicacy of feeling, sympathetic nature and quick sense of humor all combine to make these pages delightful. Whether he talks of the organ grinder in the slums or the farmer who knows nothing of the great city he is equally happy. The Lost Child gives a phase of suburban life which will be new and seem almost incredible to many readers, while A Letter to Town could hardly be surpassed for unobtrusive humor and pathos. [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1 25.]

The XIth Commandment, by Halliwell Sutcliffe. This is an ambitious book, setting a wide stage for its actors and written with considerable power, which would, however, have been better for a much greater degree of self-restraint. The author holds a brief for a party of social destruction and reconstruction, and loses no chance to score the English aristocracy and the clergymen of the English Church, among whom his acquaintance seems to have been singularly unfortunate. All the "parsons" of the tale, save one, who is its hero and leaves the church at last, are either fools or fools and knaves. On this side the author's prejudice is virulent and the picture he draws is far from pleasant. If the average English clergyman were as the book describes him the Church of England could not last a year.

The story is of caste pride thwarting true love. The author, for the sake of a dramatic touch to be made later, conceals the marriage of the lovers to the moral confusion of the book and the injury of the heroine in the reader's mind. This and kindred dealings with the relations of men and women, together with the scene describing madness and the relenting anti-climax of the sequel, which gives the disappointed lover his lady after all, tempt us to believe that Halliwell Sutcliffe is a woman, but whoever she may be we hope that she will give us another story of equal power with less prejudice and greater breadth of view and self-restraint. [New Amsterdam Book Co. $1.25.]

Slight but clever and amusing is A Marriage by Capture, in which Robert Buchanan takes us into the remoter parts of Ireland and contrasts the old and new elements of social life and feeling very effectively. We would be curious to learn what comment the "new woman" would make upon the book. [J. B. Lippincott Co. 75 cents.]

FINANCE.

International Bimetallism, by Francis A. Walker, LL. D., president of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, is as timely a book as could be desired at a time when men are most eager for light upon a supreme economic and political issue. Perusal of this book will give food for thought to those who accept unhesitatingly the dogmas of extremists on either side. They will find the question discussed dispassionately by one who has mastered the theory and history of finance, and who has served as a member of at least one great international monetary conference, having the honor to re resent the United States. President Walker believes that the United States should and will remonetize silver, but he scoffs at the proposition to have her attempt the task irrespective of the simultaneous and co-operative action of other nations. [Henry Holt & Co. $1.25]

MISCELLANEOUS.

In Classes and Masses Mr. W. H. Mallock has made a plea for the present constitution of society as against the Socialists. He calls his work "a handbook of social facts for political thinkers and speakers," and has attempted by the use of diagrams to make his meaning so plain that no one can mistake it, and with notable success. His conclusion is that "there are always social questions; but there neither is, nor ever can be, any social question. Every reform is a question of detail, of careful and circumstantial modification. It is not a question of revolutionizing fundamental principles; and though nearly all general statements are true only when allowance is made for many exceptions, the following general statement is almost general in its truth—that should a man wish to identify the points in the social system which are unalterable he will find them in the very points which Socialists and similar reformers most desire to alter." With so radically conservative a position his book will naturally call out severe criticism, but so far as Great Britain is concerned we think most of its conclusions are unassailable. [Macmillan & Co. $1.25.]

Seed-Babies, by Margaret W. Morley, with its charming illustrations, will interest children in the wonderful way in which plants and animals perpetuate themselves. Beginning with beans and ending with frogs, a good deal is told concerning the marvels of seeds and eggs. [Ginn & Co. 30 cents.]

NOTES.

—— The Dial says that 200,000 copies of a penny edition of selections from the poems of Matthew Arnold have been sold in England.

—— A portion of the library of Wordsworth is to be sold in London in August, including many presentation copies of works from younger admirers, like Matthew Arnold and Mrs. Browning.

—— By the death of Arthur Cleveland Coxe the church has lost one of its few successful hymn writers. His hymn, "O where are kings and empires now," has proved the most useful of all for many special occasions.

—— A volume of sacred song gathered from American sources is soon to be published in London of about the size and scope of Palgrave's Golden Treasury of Sacred Song. One hundred and fifty writers will be represented in its pages.

—— The burial of Mrs. Stowe on Andover Hill adds another to the claims which that locality has upon the attention of American pilgrims. It is already one of the places to which the children of the Puritans go up, and bids fair to become more and more so in the future.

—— In the death of Mr. W. H. Gibson the country has lost a teacher as well as an artist. In such books as Pastoral Days and Highways and Byways, he taught us with pencil and pen to see the beauties of our own neglected corners of field and forest. A New Englander by birth he turned from business to art, and won his way to success by hard and faithful work. The knowledge of the beauty of the world which is growing among us owes much to his efforts.

—— Apropos of "summer reading," we may perhaps be allowed to quote the story which the London Standard tells, presumably of two English girls who were talking of what they liked to read: "O, I choose a novel easily enough," said one. "I go to the circulating library and look at the last chapters. If I find the rain softly and sadly dropping over one or two lonely graves, I don't take it: but if the morning sun is glimmering over bridal robes of white satin, I know it is all right and take it, and start to buy sweets to eat while I read it."

FROM BOSTON.

Ecclesiastical and Personal.

The midsummer calm is upon the town. Church-going even on the part of the good people who stay at home is apt to become fitful and intermittent. There seems to be ample seating capacity in the city proper, despite the fact that three of our churches—Union, Central and Mt. Vernon—are closed as tightly as if they were hermetically sealed, and that two more—Old South and Shawmut—maintain preaching services only in the morning. This leaves a free field to Park Street and Berkeley Temple in the evening. Of the pastors in the city proper only Dr. Gordon remains on duty to preach to a good-sized congregation, nineteen out of twenty of whom are strangers. The Old South is probably the most popular resort, with the exception of Tremont Temple, for our friends from other sections of the country who consider Boston a desirable place to visit even in midsummer. Dr. Gordon took a portion of his vacation in a brief trip to England early in the summer, and is consequently now supplying his own pulpit until the middle of this month, though spending the week days at Andover. Certain Roxbury churches, influenced possibly by a desire to put more money into the contribution box and less into the hands of the visiting clergy, made their summer arrangements on a totally different plan from previous years. Three of them—Eliot, Immanuel and Walnut Avenue—are combining for six weeks. There has probably been less demand than ever before for the services of men from distant parts of the country, and this may partly account for the fact that we have seen fewer Western faces than usual. The Chicago editor of The Congregationalist, Dr. Williams, has been in this vicinity for the last three weeks and has made his customary thorough inspection of interesting matters, secular and religious, scouring the country in every direction with the unflagging zeal that only a long-time resident of the Lake Michigan metropolis can sustain. Professor Jernberg of Chicago Seminary has come and gone, leaving the impulse of his earnest spirit with the Norwegian churches that are his special care. Rev. J. L. Sewall of Kansas City, Rev. F. E. Hopkins of Dubuque, Superintendent Morley of Minnesota, Dr. Withrow, Prof. G. B. Willcox and Major Whittle of Chicago, Rev. H. A. Bushnell of La Grange, Ill., Dr. G. C. Adams, Rev. R. M. Sargent and Rev. C. S. Sargent of St. Louis have been among those who have sojourned hereabouts for a longer or shorter period.

Unabated Energy.

If Sunday schools and prayer meetings languish a little other forms of Christian activity bloom and fructify. Summer brings an increase of work to the City Missionary Society, and all the vacation which Mr. Waldron gets comes in escorting his fresh-air parties to Rosemary Cottage in Eliot, Me., and in conducting a series of picnics at Franklin Park, where in seven days about 8,000 persons have crowded into eight or ten hours enough happiness to last them all summer, or at least about all they get of that particular kind of pleasure during the hot months. To arrange for these great picnics, to provide ample and appetizing food, and to plan for the safe and easy transportation of these large numbers of little children and aged people would seem to be sufficient employment for one man without administering simultaneously the regular work of the society, which, through its twenty missionaries, goes on like clockwork, summer and winter alike. But, so long as Mr. Waldron maintains such a cheerful countenance and puts in evidence so much physical avoirdupois, he will never get the credit or discredit which belongs to the men who are overworking.

In more distinctively religious lines the Unitarians, this year as last, deserve commendation for embracing the opportunities for open-air gospel services which a thronged Common presents every Sunday afternoon. They have brought their best speakers to the front and are making more than a temporary impression. The Salvation Army's zeal seems to rise with the mercury, and on one of the hottest evenings of last week a demonstration was made at the Washington Street headquarters in honor of the new commander, Brigadier Cozens. The display of enthusiasm showed conclusively that those who have remained loyal to General Booth are with him heart and soul. Certainly the Volunteers have made little headway in New England. The original organization holds the bulk of the Salvationists, and as a rule it is the less capable and efficient men and women who have gone over to Ballington Booth.

The Advisory Board for the City's Philanthropies.

Mayor Quincy several months ago invited fifteen of the leading charitable and philanthropic institutions of the city to furnish him with the names of men and women from which he could select an advisory board of twenty members qualified by experience, knowledge and ambition to serve him in advising and carrying out reforms in the administration of the city's charitable, relief and penal institutions. Such names were quickly sent in, and from those presented he has selected six women, six business men, four physicians, two lawyers, one clergyman and one employé of a charitable organization—all men and women of highest character and reputation. In view of this action, it is reasonable to hope for a work of reformation sadly needed, which cannot be longer delayed without disgrace and sin.

Pleasure and Benefit Afloat.

To see is to believe in the "world of good" which has become the unwritten motto of the Boston Floating Hospital, and one who has the good fortune to be numbered among the happy "patients" on one of the semi-weekly trips of the Clifford—weather permitting—needs but a few hours to mark the symptoms of freshened vigor resulting from a day's furlough on the water from top-story tenements and "scrub" alleys. It is long before nine o'clock, the hour of sailing, on pleasant Tuesday and Friday mornings, that Atlantic Avenue in the neighborhood of Commercial Wharf becomes the objective point of scores of mothers burdened with their little ones. On their arrival at the boat side every family needs merely to show for each ailing infant a doctor's certificate, which also admits one well child from a family if he cannot be left at home. Restrictions, then, are not of race, sect or color, but merely of health and age, the limit being six years. At the gang plank the expectant voyagers run the gauntlet of inspection and assignment to various quarters of the boat, and immediate occupation of hammocks, cots and camp chairs on two decks transforms the airy craft into a miniature world of delight for weary mothers and convalescing children.

From Start to Finish.

The barge, which serves all at the same time as nursery, playroom, picnic ground and hospital, is furnished with every convenience and comfort for its intended purposes, and whatever service can be added by cheerful nurses, volunteer workers and young men attendants—altogether a force of about twenty-five—is promptly and repeatedly rendered. Moreover, every opportunity is taken for enforcing timely hints on the general care and comfort of the little ones. There is much hustle and bustle three times a day at the children's lunch hour, when their bottled portions of sterilized milk are being prepared and distributed. The older "picnickers" also have the assurance about noon that the inner man and woman will not be neglected, and their tickets, "good for one cup of coffee" and "for one lunch," materialize bountifully. It is about this time that the tow-boat, which has guided the barge well down the harbor, leaves it under the lee of a sheltering island, to swing quietly at anchor for a few hours in full range of the flooding sunlight and tempered sea breezes. The middle of the afternoon brings the order for return; but it is a set of new faces full of cheer and hope which are met by awaiting friends at the landing. "What permanent effect can be gained from one day on the water?" asks the unenlightened observer. The superintendent's records yield a gratifying response with the additional information that a child is not limited to a single trip, but is privileged to repeat the voyage as often as a physician's genuine recommendation is furnished. Tickets are secured from hospitals, dispensaries and doctors in sections of the city where there are likely to be applicants for the trip, and as a result of this generous distribution the number of "qualified" children is sometimes swelled to 150, the average, however, being less than 100. It is an exceptional day, then, when less than 200 souls are reckoned as the "cabin list" of the Clifford.

Who Receives the Thanks?

The system of operating this novel fresh-air excursion is the result of two former seasons of experience and the adoption of certain features of the work as it is conducted in New York city, where Rev. R. B. Tobey first saw and became interested in the idea. For two years after its beginning Mr. Tobey has shouldered the entire responsibility of the Boston undertaking, but now, although his active interest is still a prime factor in its continuance, Mr. P. B. Field is superintendent and the enterprise is "fathered" by the Ten Times One Society, of which Dr. E. E. Hale is president. The wholly unsectarian character of that organization promises a continuance and enforcement of that same principle of breadth and independence which has characterized this work, and the careful supervision which has developed its present degree of helpfulness distinguishes the project as especially inviting the consideration of those who through a direct channel are able and willing to relieve the necessities of "the other half." Despite careful economy the expenses of the work are unavoidably large. The contributions therefore, all of which are free-will offerings, need to be large and larger.

FROM NEW YORK.

The Committee's Verdict.

The committee of eleven appointed by the latest General Assembly to examine and report as to the wisdom and expediency of the recent change of base made by the Presbyterian boards is a body so substantial that its decision will carry unusual weight. Among its members are ex-President Harrison, Governor Beaver, John Wanamaker, Justice Harlan, Dr. Withrow and other men of note. Ten of the eleven—Justice Harlan being in Europe—met here this week, conferred freely with the officers of the boards and other competent judges and carefully examined the two properties in question: (1) the Lenox Mansion, at Fifth Avenue and Twelfth Street, given to the home and foreign mission boards by the late James Lenox and for some years used as offices by them; and (2) the new building at Fifth Avenue and Twentieth Street, erected by those boards as an investment of funds received from legacies of which the income only can be used for missions, and now occupied in part by the boards, the major part of the space being rented to other tenants, the income going into the missionary treasury.

The committee's full report has not yet been prepared, but no secret is made of the result—a unanimous approval of the erection of the new mission house and of the use now made of it; a unanimous indorsement of the integrity, fidelity and loyal service of the boards and of their wise administration of their trusts, with hearty commendation of them to the confidence and generous financial support of the churches. It is reasonable to expect that this report, when officially made public, will go far towards ending a somewhat heated discussion that has hindered not a little the grand mission work of the Presbyterian brethren.

The Broadway Tabernacle.

Only the auditorium of the Broadway Tabernacle is to be "closed" during its needed cleaning and decoration. The Sunday services are to be continued in the chapel through the summer. Dr. Nehemiah Boynton preached there again with great acceptance on July 26, and Dr. John E. Tuttle of Amherst College is expected to supply through August.

The New Church Uptown.

The embryo Congregational church on the west side of Central Park has so far matured that those engaged in it have called Rev. Dr. H. A. Stimson to take the pastoral charge, and he has accepted the invitation. They have also secured a comfortable hall at the Boulevard and Eighty-third Street as a temporary place of worship, and propose to begin public services there by the first of October, or a week or two earlier. Those personally concerned in the movement express themselves as fully warranted by the number and resources of their pledged adherents in expecting early and ample success in their plans for adding another to our little band of ten churches of the Pilgrim faith and order in the city.

A Beautiful Charity.

A well-known citizen of New York, Mr. Nathan Straus, has now for four years materially lowered the city babies' death rate and won the gratitude of thousands of poor mothers by his free daily distribution of sterilized milk for the use of sick infants of the poor. Since this beautiful charity began the percentage of fatal illness among children has been perceptibly smaller on this side of the river than in Brooklyn, with its generally conceded advantages of position, cleanliness and roomier tenements, and physicians have agreed in giving to Mr. Straus much credit for the improvement. Great, therefore, was the joy of Brooklyn's health board, this week, in announcing that one of her citizens, name withheld—it has since come out that he is our Mr. Straus himself—would provide for gratuitous distribution, under proper guards against imposture, 1,000 bottles daily of sterilized milk for the same class of little sufferers. There was some delay in arranging the preliminaries, but the distribution has begun, and the results will be watched with interest by the medical faculty of both cities. If New York's experience proves to be duplicated in Brooklyn, surely no time should be lost in making the experiment in all our large cities.

Still Coming Down.

Twenty more this week, making seventy-seven, of those rear tenement pest holes have been condemned to demolition by the health board, and not a moment too soon. The board has found that in some of these tenements the deaths have been four times the average rate of the city. Well done, so far; but what are these among so many? The authorities report that there yet remain something like 2,000 rear tenements—not all, indeed, as foul and dangerous as those already condemned—but all unwarrantably intruding on the breathing space that belongs of right to others. Let the good work go on, here and everywhere.

Personals.

Dr. Pentecost is supplying the pulpit of Dr. John Hall, and Dr. Pierson that of Dr. Davies of the Fourth Avenue Presbyterian Church.——Mrs. Ballington Booth led last Sunday's service in the State camp at Peekskill, thronging the tennis court and moving all hearts by the fervor of her address and the sweetness of the spiritual songs by her attendant Volunteer.——Rev. Dr. R. J. Kent of Lewis Avenue Church, Brooklyn, is summering with his family at Blue Point, L. I., where the best "half-shells" grow.——Dr. and Mrs. F. E. Clark received a rousing send-off from the Brooklyn Christian Endeavor Union, in Dr. Meredith's church, the evening before their boarding the Fürst Bismarck for their long pilgrimage over Europe, Asia and Africa. Both made addresses and received the Chautauqua farewell cheer.——Dr. E. P. Ingersoll is preaching in the Brooklyn churches and taking his vacation there among his loving friends. ——Drs. Griffis, Herrick, Walker of Amherst Agricultural College and Danforth of Philadelphia are among the Brooklyn pulpit vacation supplies.

HUNTINGTON.

"It was an act of God." Such was said to be the verdict of the Russian Government after investigating the terrible disaster on the Khodinsky Plain, probing having revealed the fact that the venality and disobedience of certain officials were responsible for it. Fortunately, the latest reports from St. Petersburg announce that there is to be no such whitewashing coupled with blasphemy as once seemed probable, and the prefect of the Moscow police, the president of the organization committee and the architect of the temporary buildings are to be tried by a body of judges of high standing and a jury representing all classes of the community.

PRAYER MEETING.

BY REV. H. A. BRIDGMAN.

Topic, Aug. 16-22. Seeing God in Nature. Ps. 19: 1-6; 24: 1-10.

One reason why it is so good to be living in these days is that people generally are awaking to the beauty of the natural world and to the part it is meant to have in the development of their better selves. Mr. Lowell in his fine essay on Winter has shown how distinctively a modern thing is this appreciation of nature. To be sure David had something of it and Jesus had it in the largest measure, but Paul had very little of it, and through all the centuries since then until our own, so far as we can gather from the various tokens that have come down to us, there was no widespread regard for the outward world and its teachings. Even the poets a hundred years ago were only beginning to venture timidly into this region of thought. Now the most graceful makers of verses, the most charming essayists, the ablest botanists, astronomers and naturalists deem it worth their while to try to state in simple language the things which they have seen and heard in the sky above them and in the air and earth about them. The result is that thousands of little children today know more about the wild flowers and the birds than many men who have a college degree. The annual exodus from city to country has helped forward this general knowledge. Modern life becoming daily more strained and artificial simply drives people into the fields and woods for recuperation. There, where they can talk with winged and furry creatures and like St. Francis of old call them their little brothers and sisters, tired souls become strong and calm and simple again.

Think, too, of how easy it is getting to be to lay hold of such supplies for our physical and spiritual natures. The bicycle and the electric car have come to bring them within easy reach. Athletic sports call us from our studies and our stores. Outing and tramping clubs enlist some who would not taste the pleasures of pedestrianism unless it had come to be more or less fashionable. In these and other ways all that is valuable in nature is brought close to our doors. We fancy sometimes that in order to see God in nature we must climb to the top of some high mountain, or await the rumble of an awful thunderstorm, or gaze upon some distant famous bit of landscape. But all around us are the glories of God's handwork, had we eyes to see them. Mr. Lowell—to allude once more to him—has a sarcastic word for the people who have to go over to the Alps to learn what the divine silence of the snow is, or who must run to Italy before they are conscious of the miracle wrought every day under their very noses by the sunset, or who must call upon the Berkshire Hills to teach them what a painter autumn is, while close at hand the meadows make all orioles cheap with hues that show as if a sunset cloud had been wrecked among their maples.

Nature will never mean much to us unless we have learned to see God in it, unless outward forms convey spiritual suggestions and stir the heart to noble resolves. Two men look at the same glorious prospect. One sees only the sweep and the dip of the distant hills, the gleam of the winding river, the broad meadows with their dancing flowers and grasses. The other man sees all this and vastly more. He sees the richness of the divine mind, the loving thoughtfulness of a Father in heaven, and because he sees them his heart throbs anew with hope and trust. Why does he see these eternal realities? Because he has already learned to see God in the providences of his life, in his daily duty, in the Bible and particularly in Christ, the interpreter of all of God's revelations.

Parallel verses: Job 28: 10; Ps. 50: 10; 95: 4; 121: 1; 144: 5; Isa. 43: 19; Mark 11: 19; 14: 26; Luke 12: 27, 28; Rev. 22: 1.

Rev. Alexander McKenzie, D. D., President; George Gould, Treasurer.

PASSING COMMENT ON THIS WEEK'S NEWS.

Our Illinois correspondent, who writes of the destructive fire which has left a church in that State entirely destitute of its property and any return for it, adds, "Query: How can church officers excuse themselves for being less careful respecting church property than concerning their own?" We await an answer from the other churches which for years have been following the same course, and despite warnings and warnings will still continue without reason for such neglect.

Times have changed, and standards too, since the "raising" of the old meeting house in an important northern New England city. It will set our readers at rest to know that the present pastor will not repeat all the details of the customs carried out seventy years ago.

The C. H. M. S. comes in for a large bequest from a loyal Connecticut Congregationalist. The tidings will exhilarate the officers and friends of the society, and go far toward compensating the dryness in the stream of benevolence which August always registers.

Special attention paid to the old members is already a regular yearly feature in some churches. Two others reporting this week from New Hampshire and New York held such occasions so successfully that one at least has made it an annual affair.

Several pastors whose plans for the fall are already under way are bearing in mind the need of better preparation for active work and will conduct among their young people schools for better Christian service.

The program of a central Massachusetts Sunday school for the summer presents a unique plan of work which will doubtless have continued attractiveness.

There are many young people's societies which would be glad to report as great summer activity as a New Jersey organization.

A Wisconsin church has reason to go on its way rejoicing.

AN ILLINOIS JUBILEE.

The First Church of Winnebago, Ill., celebrated its semi-centennial July 11, 12. The program of the first day included addresses by Rev. W. H. Ross, the pastor, the local pastors and others. The choir sang an original hymn composed by Rev. H. M. Daniels, who was pastor of the church for fourteen years, and after the roll-call of pastors loving memories of those who had finished their earthly work were called up. The women of the congregation served an excellent dinner upon the lawn, where an awning had been spread for an occasion of good cheer and hearty sympathy.

In the afternoon the people gathered again in the church, and after song and prayer listened to a historical paper prepared with great care by Mr. O. R. Gorham, who has long been a member of the church. He came to Winnebago in 1846 and so was qualified for his part.

Dr. T. N. Miller of Rockford, now a Presbyterian, but early in life a member of this church, read a paper concerning the former members, and every heart was touched by his references to those who had crossed to the other side. Dr. James Tompkins read an able paper upon Congregationalism Suited to the Present and the Future. With all confidence he declared the perfect adaptability of the simple New Testament polity of our churches to meet every demand of the times in carrying forward the work of Christ.

The roll was then called of all former and present living members of the church. Letters were read from many who were absent, and those present responded in brief remarks. Among those who sent items of special interest were Mr. Alba Miller of Mason City, Io., the only surviving charter member; and Mr. H. P. Sloan of Dehesa, Cal., a member of the first board of trustees. Mr. Wallace Gorham of Spirit Lake, Io., sent an original poem, and Mr. James Langwell of Owen, Ill., read an intensely interesting paper of reminiscences.

The services of Sunday were interesting and profitable. The anniversary sermon by Dr. Tompkins was helpful and full of encouragement. The communion service was peculiarly tender, and in the evening Rev. J. T. Chynoweth, a former pastor, preached to a union congregation.

The church has erected two houses of worship during its fifty years' existence—"the old stone church" in 1854 situated in the country, and the present beautiful edifice in the village in 1883. During the past year a neat and convenient parsonage was erected, largely as the result of the indefatigable labors of the present pastor.

The church enters upon its second half-century with faith and courage, and expects to win grander victories "In His Name."

ANOTHER IMPROVED ORGAN.

The Compton Hill Church of St. Louis has just put in a pipe organ which represents a new system of construction but little used as yet. The distinguishing feature is a large air reservoir, or, as it is called, a "universal wind chest," which may be entered through two air-tight doors. From the inside the construction is easily seen. At one side is an electric motor, which drives three air pumps, and these draw the air in instead of forcing it. Along one side of the room is a "displacement board," which responds instantly to any alteration of pressure in the air chamber and instantly regulates the pumps and motor. Thus the pressure in the reservoir is always kept at exactly the same tension.

The pipes are located on the top of the air chest, each with a separate valve and all in direct connection with the air chamber. The valves, connections and other parts, while completely protected from dust, are in full view in the chest, and all are accessible, being attached to the top and sides of the room. There are no glue joints in the chest. It is framed, paneled and packed and secured by screws to the framework. Moreover, there are no glue joints or joints of any kind between the valves and the pipes. The connection is direct.

The key desk, about as large as a small reed organ, stands directly in front of the air chamber, and is so placed that the organist faces the audience.

The manuals, pedals, couplers and stops are constructed with a "tubular pneumatic" system. The action is prompt and the touch is light, elastic and noiseless. A series of "on" and "off" tablets brings on any desired combination of stops which has previously been made by drawing the registers. The keys require only a four-ounce pressure, which need not be increased when all the notes which can possibly be played by a given key are connected with it. The force which operates the couplers is the ordinary pressure of air in the chest.

The organ has been thoroughly and even severely tested and is giving good satisfaction. Compton Hill Church and Dr. G. C. Adams may be congratulated on the work which during these years of financial distress they have accomplished. The meeting house is completed and the organ is in place.

NEW ENGLAND.

Massachusetts.

QUINCY.—The evangelical church has become incorporated under the name, Bethany Congregational Church. The pastor, Rev. E. N. Hardy, has recently completed the first year of his pastorate. Twenty-seven new members have been received into the church during the year. Extensive preparations are being made for the coming year. These include a training school for Christian service, the leading features of which will be a comprehensive course in Bible study and lectures on the various phases of Christian life and work.

LOWELL.—Kirk Street. The society has voted unanimously to expend $10,000 in renovating the house of worship, and a new organ has been presented as a memorial of a member lately deceased. An invitation to worship with the First Church during repairs has been accepted with thanks. The installation of the new pastor, Rev. W. A. Bartlett, will be deferred until the completion of these alterations.——The Lowell Street Railway Co. shows its appreciation of the work of the Armenian missionary, who preaches both in Lowell and in Nashua, N. H., by presenting him with a free pass between the two cities.

WORCESTER.—Central. During vacation the junior section of the Sunday school will, in place of the regular lessons, read Pilgrim's Progress under the leadership of the superintendent. The senior section will be turned into an informal conference, discussing themes on church polity and creeds; relations of the church and the family, the community and social relations; study of the Bible; church membership and responsibilities.——Immanuel. Rev. G. S. Dodge will spend part of the vacation at the Northfield Conference.

Maine.

SEARSPORT.—Misses Washburn and Hale have spent some time here and their work was greatly blessed. Two new members have joined the church at the harbor and 14 at the village. These two churches recently contributed about $35 in aid of the coast missionary work of Captain Allen, who succeeds Captain Lane. The lady visitors go now to Martinicus, a rocky island about 20 miles from Rockland. Barrels of clothing are much needed in this coast work, and may be sent to Rev. R. G. Harbutt of Searsport.

ALLEN'S MILLS.—This is an old church, but practically new since 1891, when a beautiful chapel was built and services were begun by the pastor, Rev.

W. B. Kenniston. He preaches also at the Free Baptist meeting house with good results, and there has been increased interest and accessions since the Week of Prayer. New voices are heard in the meetings and growth is manifest. An unusual point of interest of the church is the preponderance of male members.

BATH.—One result of the deepened spiritual life since the revival meetings is seen in the accessions to the churches. Eleven joined Winter Street on confession and one by letter, while at the Central nine members were added on confession and two by letter.

EAST SUMNER.—This little church, where Rev. P. E. Miller ministers, is rejoiced to receive six members on confession and one by letter.

New Hampshire.

EXETER.—Second. The old church building, having been sold, is now undergoing the process of demolition, and it is expected ground will be broken for the new edifice early in September. At the sale the stone and brick work were reserved, as also the pulpit and two oak beams in the bell deck, which belonged to the first meeting house of the parish, and will somewhere be put into the new structure. As illustrating the custom of the times it may be said that at the raising of the meeting house in 1823, Rev. Isaac Hurd, the pastor, sent to the workmen from the parsonage across the street a tub of excellent brandy punch. Pew No. 10, in which Abraham Lincoln sat when he spent a Sunday in town during the winter of 1860-1, was purchased by a parishioner and presented to Rev. G. E. Street, D. D., senior pastor. Other pews were also purchased on account of family associations. Beginning with the first Sunday in August the regular services of the church will be held in the Elm Street Chapel till the new house is ready for occupancy. During August the First Church will unite in worship here. The finishing touches are fast being given to Peabody Hall, the new dormitory of the academy erected in the rear of the church edifice. The rooms will be especially attractive, having not only charming views across the academy grounds, but every one an open fireplace surmounted by the seal of the academy handsomely wrought in iron.

KEENE.—First. An old folks' social held a few days ago made evident the fact that this church has a score of members who are between 80 and 90 years of age, while those who have reached or passed the mark of 70 increase the list to more than half a hundred. Three were present who joined the church 65 years ago. Two of these, Deacon and Mrs. William Metcalf, are soon to leave the city, and this unique social was planned that the congregation might do honor to them and the many others who have led the march and borne the burdens for decades. Light refreshments, a simple but touching program, and the assembling of so large a company from the generation that is passing made a happy and memorable occasion. Rev. W. G. Poor is pastor.

BENNINGTON.—On account of repairs going on in the interior of the meeting house, Children's Day was postponed till the last of July, but was none the less interesting and enjoyable. Seven little ones were baptized, and two who had been previously baptized were presented with commemorative Bibles. A special sermon to children was given by the pastor in the morning, and in the evening an excellent Sunday school concert was held. New pews for the audience-room of the church are expected to be secured early in September.

GILSUM.—The recent completion of a beautiful lawn in front of the parsonage renders the surroundings much more attractive than formerly, and is not the least of the many improvements made on the church property during the last two years. The pastor, Rev. J. S. Gove, and wife are to spend the larger part of August in study and recreation at Northfield, Mass. Meanwhile the regular services of the church will be sustained.

MARLBORO.—The pastor, Rev. J. S. Colby, is taking charge this week of the Hebrew department at a ministerial institute at Hedding camp ground, East Epping, a strictly Methodist enterprise. During the summer he is giving his people, for Sunday evenings in July and August, a course of patriotic sermons. The attendance reaches its maximum for the year these two months, owing to summer visitors.

MANCHESTER.—First. The pastor, Dr. T. E. Clapp, recently announced his purpose to give a personal offering to the Armenian Relief Fund, and the pleasure it would give him to receive additions from any who might feel disposed to contribute. Without further solicitation he received during the following week over $100.

Vermont.

RUTLAND.—The corner stone of the Christian Endeavor chapel at Mill Village was laid recently, there being many interested persons present. The C. E. Society of this city aided the new society in the village at first and the latter has been meeting in a schoolhouse The circle of King's Daughters has also aided the work for the chapel. The house will contain a room 32 by 24 feet for meetings and in the ell will be a room 16 by 24 for social purposes. Thus 175 seats can be provided.

Connecticut.

WEST HARTFORD.—The total amount of home expenses last year was $26,445. The method of raising the money is the voluntary pledge system. The seats are free and a weekly offering is received. Legacies received are the Cornelia Thomson Fund, $1,000, given by J. M. Thomson in memory of his wife, a member of this church, the income to be used for the purchase of reading matter for the free library, and $591 added to the Abagail P. Talcott legacy, the income to be equally divided between home and foreign missions. There is deposited in the bank to the credit of the Parsonage Fund, which was started last year, $615. The improvements of the year are a new sidewalk in front of the church, a water motor for the organ, new furnaces in both church and parsonage, and repairs on the parsonage.

EAST HAMPTON.—Abner G. Bevin, one of the best-known and most respected citizens of the town, died a week ago Saturday night at the advanced age of 86 years. He was a prominent manufacturer and served in many important offices of public trust, having served while a member of the General Assembly of 1873 as one of the committee which had charge of the erection of the present State Capitol, which is a source of so much admiration. He was a faithful member of the South Church for over 60 years, and served on the committee for the construction of the present church building, erected in 1854, and the parsonage, which was put up more recently. He taught a class in Sunday school until just before his death, and will be much missed in all the lines of church work.

BROOKLYN.—The two agents of the Connecticut Bible Society have completed a canvass of the town. Ten denominations are represented, the Congregationalists ranking second, with 107 families and 364 persons. Attending no church there are 201 Protestants as against 20 Roman Catholics. There are six nationalities represented, the French (Canadian) leading with 1,126 persons, while there are only 270 native-born Americans out of the total population of 2,391. Nearly one half are French, it will be seen, and are consequently Roman Catholics.

NEW BRITAIN.—The late Dr. Frank Woodruff left an estate amounting to nearly $200,000. The use of this sum, together with $10,000 outright, was given his widow with the understanding that upon her death it was to go to the Congregational Home Missionary Society after a few small bequests were paid from it. Mrs. Woodruff has just died and the society will get between $150,000 and $175,000, the original sum being reduced somewhat on account of the shrinkage in the value of the stocks in which it is invested.

MIDDLETOWN.—The labors of Miss Lord of the Connecticut Sunday School Association in that part of the town known as Johnson's Lane have been blessed by 30 conversions. The work has been carried on by house to house visitations and by special services.

HOCKANUM.—At a recent meeting the church and society were merged into a corporation to be known as the South Congregational Church of East Hartford. Officers were elected, with Elizur R. Eusign as president.

TORRINGTON.—The pastor, Rev. H. B. Roberts, is spending the month of August on the coast of Maine. Previous to his departure he was presented with a generous personal gift in cash by one of his parishioners.

COLLINSVILLE.—Swedish. The members of Pilgrim Church are making special efforts to reduce the church debt, subscription papers being circulated among the members. Over $400 have been pledged so far.

SOUTHINGTON.—The church will be closed during the vacation of the pastor. An invitation has been extended the members to attend the Baptist church during that time by its pastor, Rev. Mr. Breaker.

WETHERSFIELD.—The organ, which has been undergoing repairs for the last month, was used for the first time a week ago Sunday morning, when there was a special musical service.

WILLIMANTIC.—Rev. and Mrs. E. A. George are spending their vacation on Long Island. During the month of August there will be no Sunday services in the church.

HADDAM NECK. The lawn party given recently by the Sunday school was liberally patronized and resulted in adding $25 to the fund for purchasing new books for the Sunday school library.

CHESTER.—A mass meeting in the interests of the Armenian sufferers was held last Sunday evening and was largely attended. Quite a sum was contributed towards their relief.

PINE ORCHARD.—Nearly money enough has been subscribed to build the proposed new chapel, and the land has been given on which to erect it.

MIDDLE STATES.

New York.

CARTHAGE.—First. The Old Folks' Day, despite the indications of a wet day, found a good representation of the aged at the meeting house on a recent Sunday morning. The average age of the nine who occupied easy-chairs was 84½ years. The day was so successful and pleasing that Old Folks' Day will doubtless have its place in the special services of the church. Carriages were provided for the old people. Our oldest member is 102 years of age. He has been to church but once since he was 100. Rev. J. B. Felt has just completed three years of service here, in which time 72 persons have united with the church, 57 on confession.

BROOKLYN.—Park. Rev. R. C. Hallock was, at his own request, dismissed from the pastorate July 27. He has been here since Jan. 1, 1893. Church and council united in hearty commendation of Dr. Hallock's character and work, and the parish emphasized their kind words with a parting gift of $1,000. Dr. Hallock is a graduate of Princeton, and proposes to go thither in the early autumn for further study, preaching, meanwhile, as opportunity offers, before resuming pastoral care.

LITTLE VALLEY.—The church building here is now lighted by electricity. This church holds Children's Day services Aug. 9. The C. E. Society is raising funds to paper the auditorium. The weekly system of payments has been introduced and the people are taking hold of all lines of work with much interest. Congregations and the Sunday school show marked improvement in numbers. Rev. E. C. Woodruff is pastor.

MORAVIA—The pastor, Dr. W. H. Hampton, has given lectures on Sunday evenings all summer on timely themes connected with the present and historical work of the church. This new departure has doubled the evening congregation. On a recent Sunday he addressed the Masonic Fraternity before an unusually large congregation.

GRIFFIN'S MILLS.—The pastor, Rev. F. A. Kimberley, is greatly afflicted in the death of his wife. These young people, with much self-denial and consecration, have done a good work in this old church, now become small and weak.

EAST MCDONOUGH.—This new church received seven members on confession last Sunday, part of them being baptized by immersion and others by sprinkling, a Freewill Baptist minister conducting the immersion.

A new bell is one of the improvements in view by the church in Lisle.

New Jersey.

NUTLEY.—St. Paul's continues to prosper, notwithstanding the services are still held in a club house. Seven members were added at the last communion, five on confession. Strenuous efforts are being made to swell the building fund, two open air fêtes given by the Young People's Society having furnished $50 toward that end. The attendance at the services, even in the hot weather, is better than ever before, the accommodations being taxed to their utmost. One of the deacons, formerly a lay preacher in the Methodist Church, will supply the pulpit during the pastor's vacation. The King's Daughters send flowers each week to the neighboring cities.

UPPER MONTCLAIR.—The two years' work of Rev. H. S. Bliss has resulted in such success and progress that the question of a new edifice is prominent just now. The numerical growth has been particularly marked, but the end in view has been continually for more earnest individual consecration. The pastor is now away on his vacation, to be spent mostly in New Hampshire.

HAWORTH.—This town is growing and the church increasing. A movement is now a-foot to secure a resident pastor, which heretofore the church has never been able to accomplish. The financial year closes with excellent reports.

The Scandinavian churches in the State continue to move forward hopefully. The Dover church has secured a building lot and about $1,000 toward a house of worship. The East Orange church recently had a successful concert conducted by Prof. J. A. Hultman of Chicago, and a visit from Rev. S. V. S. Fisher of Minneapolis, superintendent of Scandinavian work; and the pastor of the new Montclair church has just gone to Minnesota to be married.

The church building in Westfield will be closed for repairs during a part of the pastor's vacation in August.

THE SOUTH.

District of Columbia.

WASHINGTON.—Plymouth. The late Mrs. Harriet Webster, whose husband, Dr. Peter Parker, died here July 10, left $2,000 to this church. Dr. Parker was a member of the church 68 years.

Georgia.

BAXLEY.—Special services by Rev. G. N. Smith, pastor, assisted by Rev. D. F. Studley, resulted in an addition of 13 to the church, eight on confession.

Special services in Hoboken, closing July 9, have resulted in the addition of 21 to the church on confession.

THE INTERIOR.

Illinois.

DANVILLE.—Rev. James Hayes, located in this coal mine district, is laboring with his usual zeal and success. Several stations are under his care. In South Danville the house of worship is entirely too small to hold the congregations. To remedy this a well-located lot has been secured, on which one payment has been made. The people are bending every energy to raise the balance. In addition the church has rented a brick kiln, with permission to make 200,000 bricks with which to put up a building. Already 50,000 bricks are in the kiln. A month's time will be required to burn the requisite number of bricks. All the people—men and women—are deeply in earnest and are loyally following the leadership of their self-denying and devoted pastor. In the midst of all this effort to better their own condition, which has been going on for three months, the church has contributed and forwarded to the H. M. S. the sum of $20 to aid other struggling churches. A like course of action on the part of all the churches would make an overflowing treasury, and cause the Congregational wilderness of mission fields to blossom as the rose.

HAVANA.—The new church, Rev. J. M. Sutherland, pastor, is making sure and steady progress notwithstanding the fact that services can be held, for lack of a building, only at 1.30 P. M. these hot, summer days. It is expected that the contract for a church edifice will be let within a few days.

GARDEN PRAIRIE.—The church has met with a severe loss in the destruction of its house of worship by fire July 31. Only the organ, Bible and a few chairs were saved. The saddest feature of all is that the insurance had been allowed to lapse, thus making the loss complete.

Indiana.

EAST CHICAGO.—Rev. F. E. Bigelow is taking his vacation around his early home in northern Massachusetts. Meanwhile, excellent service is being done by Rev. William Davidson, late of Scotland, as supply. A renewed effort is being made to pay off the debt to the Building Society. A payment of $38 was made July 1, and there are to be quarterly payments hereafter until the obligation is met.

TERRE HAUTE.—First will be closed during August. When it opens, Sept. 1, supplies will be had until a regular pastor is secured. The church work is going on as usual. A few hundred dollars will be expended in repairing and decorating the present edifice, and it will be occupied at least another year. The church, however, proposes to sell and build in the near future.

THE WEST.

Iowa.

WINTHROP.—Since Rev. C. B. Carlisle became pastor about two years ago about 60 members have been added, all but eight on confession; a $1,300 parsonage has been built, and about $500 are now being expended on renovating and beautifying the church building. The Y. P. S. C. E. has already made of the lecture-room a handsome and attractive place of meeting. Unity and enthusiasm prevail among the members.

RODNEY AND SMITHLAND.—Rev. G. W. Tingle closes his pastorate Aug. 1, having decided not to accept the call for another year's work at these points and at Oto. During the past 12 months the work has progressed encouragingly. The membership has been increased by 28, and the average attendance from 15 to 40. A Sunday school has been organized at Smithland, also C. E. Societies there and at Oto.

SALEM.—Nine persons were added to the membership July 12, six on confession. Rev. F. N. White of Burlington recently gave an interesting lecture upon Japan—a subject on which he speaks from personal knowledge, having been a missionary there.

Minnesota.

DULUTH.—Morley. The new house of worship was dedicated July 28, with addresses from Rev. Messrs. C. H. Patton and J. H. Morley. The property is worth about $4,000 and is paid for with the exception of a mortgage on the lot given by Pilgrim Church. The church was organized two years ago and has made remarkable growth considering the financial stringency of the times. Situated in the best residence portion of the city, its future is assured. Rev. W. W. Newell was installed as pastor July 29.

HIBBING.—The work has suffered through the sudden departure of the minister. Rev. Messrs. J. H. Morley, R. P. Herrick, E. C. Lyons and G. E. Northrup held a service July 26, after which a Congregational society was organized and it was decided to push the work vigorously. Lots are to be secured, though building may be postponed until next year. The town is one of the best on the Iron Range. Rev. E. C. Lyons of Appleton has done good vacation service in reorganizing this work.

GRANADA.—Work has been opened at some outstations and the little church has grown in strength. The force has been somewhat divided by the incoming of another denomination. A series of meetings recently developed the spiritual life of the community.

ROSE CREEK.—A former pastor, Rev. F. J. Brown, has visited this church and Taopi, administering the sacrament of the Lord's Supper and baptism and encouraging the churches. They are supplied by a Methodist minister until a pastor can be secured.

ST. PAUL.—Atlantic. Rev. S. W. Dickinson closes his work this month. Eighty-seven persons have been added to the church roll during his four years' pastorate. He was formerly pastor of Fifth Avenue Church, Minneapolis.

MONTEVIDEO.—The edifice is being enlarged by an addition to accommodate the Sunday school. The auditorium is to be reseated with chairs and heated by furnace. The C. C. B. S. assists.

MADISON.—Before the departure of Rev. E. A. Powell several Norwegian women called on his wife and after a pleasant social gathering left a purse testifying to their esteem.

Kansas.

RUSH CENTER.—After an interim of four years with closed doors the church is experiencing a refreshing work of grace under the leadership of Rev. George H. Hull, the new pastor. Conversions have marked every Sunday evening service. Six new members were received June 29 and six others July 26. This renewal of church life took place after nearly ten years of crop failure and in the face of other discouragements.

DOWNS.—Six special Sunday evening services have been arranged for the summer months. Features are music, one recitation and an open conference of 30 minutes. Among the topics are: As the World Now Is Could All People Work in One Church? Why Do Not More People Come into the Churches? Is the Sunday School What It Should Be?—If Not, What Is the Remedy?

GOODLAND.—Energetic effort has resulted in the payment of the last installment due the C. C. B. S. and the raising of a sufficient proportion of the pastor's salary to secure his services for full time after Aug. 9. The town is on the extreme Western frontier, has 1,000 inhabitants and is the end of a division of the Rock Island R. R.

BLUE RAPIDS.—Responding to the labors of an Oberlin student in charge for the summer this church is taking forward steps. A weekly prayer meeting has been established and a Y. P. S. C. E. organized. Several persons are soon to become members.

JUNCTION CITY.—The membership has become reduced and at present cannot support a pastor, but a Sunday school is maintained in the afternoon for the neglected classes, and the church members are active in service to the poor and erring in the city.

LENORA.—Rev. J. H. Gowdey, who supplies here during the summer, is conducting revival meetings in the town and in outlying districts. The church membership already has increased to about 75.

ALMENA.—The Sunday school attendance is increasing, and the work in two out-districts is specially flourishing. In the Buffalo district 30 persons attend the weekly prayer meeting.

STRONG CITY.—Mr. Aaron Breck of Yale Seminary is pastor for the summer, and finds much to encourage him in the spiritual earnestness of faithful members.

KINSLEY.—This church, near the frontier, has carried unusual financial burdens, but it now has a resident pastor and is making good progress.

Rev. D. H. Platt, who has served two years as pastor at large in northwestern Kansas, after Aug. 9 will concentrate his labors at Goodland, one of his preaching points. His work has been laborious and exceedingly useful, holding churches together, encouraging scattered communities and cheering the disappointed and destitute on the frontier.

Nebraska.

BLAIR.—Mrs. G. C. Hall, acting pastor at Nebraska City, has spent two weeks here lately on account of the illness of her father, Rev. G. W. Wainwright, D. D., who returned to his home from his charge at Ainsworth in such poor health that he is likely to be compelled to resign his charge. Miss Nellie Wainwright, who has been engaged in foreign missionary work in Japan for the last nine years, is at home for a brief visit and has received a most cordial welcome from friends in Blair. After resting she will speak upon life and missionary work in Japan.

BUTTE AND SPENCER.—Rev. W. A. Hensel is encouraged to find the work constantly growing in interest and strength under his hand. Eight persons have lately united with the Butte church on confession and others are expected later. The Spencer church will soon call a council for the ordination of Mr. Hensel.

North Dakota.

HARWOOD.—Mr. D. G. Colp, who has done excellent work as acting pastor for a year and a half, will close his labors here in September to enter Yale Seminary. During his service the edifice has been repaired and improved. Mr. Colp was a member of the first class graduating from Fargo College.

INKSTER AND ORR.—The work is gaining here under the efficient lead of Rev. C. Y. Snell. Though crops are nearly a failure, religious interests are sustained with unflagging zeal.

DEXTER.—Mr. Lewis Vaughan, a student from Fargo College, is supplying this church in connection with Geneva and Wyndmere. It gives him a large and encouraging field.

Since the coming of Mr. W. A. Wilkinson to Abercrombie attendance upon the church services has largely increased.

Oklahoma.

SOUTH ENID.—Evangelist Parker has just closed a series of meetings. Thirty-five persons professed conversion, and 30 have united with the church.

The Outlook, Superintendent Parker's little paper, fails to make weekly calls for lack of financial support.——The pastorate at Pleasant Hill is made vacant by refusal of missionary aid.——Special services are in progress at Union, near Stillwater, in charge of the pastor, Rev. I. A. Holbrook, assisted by Mr. Lasswell.

PACIFIC COAST.

California.

SAN FRANCISCO.—Seamen's Bethel. The reading-room is a great attraction, some 20,000 to 30,000 visits having been made there last year. Thousands of men have also come to attend the social gatherings. Twice each week refreshments are served to visitors in connection with literary and religious exercises. In these occasions of rare enjoyment for those who "go down to the sea in ships" the Endeavorers of the city have been a great help.——The California Indian Association, meeting monthly in this city, has a branch in San José composed of wealthy and influential women. Together these organizations have engaged a Congregational minister to labor among the Indians in Hoopa Valley for six months at a moderate salary. He is much encouraged in his work. An Indian convention, attended by prominent delegates from the East, will be held here this month.

FERNDALE.—Rev. S. M. Wood has arranged for a summer school, with missionary extension as the central theme. Miss Williams of Oakland, president of the Young Woman's Branch, is to speak. Humboldt County, of which this is a prosperous town, is one of the richest counties in the State, but somewhat isolated, being 200 miles north of San Francisco by steamer. It has several Congregational churches.

LOOMIS.—Rev. E. E. Chakurian, an Armenian studying at Pacific Seminary, is spending his vacation with this church. Occasionally he visits neighboring fields and interests the audiences in the work of the American Board in Asia Minor. Due largely to his influence, seconded by earnest pastors, the churches of Placer County are raising money for the Armenians.

SAN QUENTIN.—Three conversions are reported at a recent Sunday afternoon service in the yard of the State Prison. Rev. August Drahms has been the devoted chaplain for four years.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR NOTES.

A C. E. scholarship in Illinois College has been founded by societies in the vicinity of Jacksonville.

The reformatory at Concord, Mass., has a society of 90 members, 45 being active. Messages from other societies will be welcome.

Fifteen sailors on a vessel visiting the harbor of San Diego, Cal., were led to a public confession of Christ by the Floating Society of Christian Endeavor.

A bicycle club has been organized among the Endeavorers in and about Hull, Eng., to hold open-air meetings in the villages around, where no active evangelistic workers are to be found.

A day was spent in picking blackberries by a society in West Salem, Ill., which gave the proceeds for home missionary work.—The protection of song birds has been taken up as part of its work by the sunshine committee of a Nebraska society.

A flower committee in Perryville, Ky., furnishes each week a package of flowers to a flower committee in Louisville that uses them in decorating its church, and then distributes them to the sick. Many city and country societies might arrange thus to work together to advantage.

During a rose carnival at Tacoma, Wn., one society set up in the park an arch with Y. P. S. C. E. in white roses, and the C. E. monogram, also in white roses, hung in the center. A card invitation to the various C. E. meetings of the city was also posted and attracted the notice of large numbers of passers-by.

Three new trustees of the United Society were chosen at Washington—Rev. H. K. Carroll, LL. D., to represent the Methodist Episcopal Church, and two others from denominations not before represented, Rev. W. H. Vogler, the president of the Moravian National Union, and Rev. U. F. Swengel from the United Evangelical Church, which has been formed within a few years, and has given the society formal recognition in its constitution.

The Chittenden County Union of Vermont at a recent meeting took for a subject The Evolution of a Citizen, and treated it under these divisions: The Mother's Influence, The Father's Influence, The Sister's Influence, The Influence of the Public Schools, The Influence of the Junior Society, The Influence of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor, The Wife's Influence, The Young Christian as a Citizen, The American as a Citizen of the World. The State president also gave an address on Jesus Christ, the Citizen's Model.

An "echo meeting" of the 1896 convention was held July 21, by the Boston Union, in People's Temple, and addresses were given by Rev. W. E. Barton, D. D., Mr. William Shaw, Rev. J. T. Beckley, D. D., and the delegates from England—Rev. Arnold Streuli and Rev. J. B. Morgan. The last part of the meeting was in the nature of a farewell to Dr. Clark, who replied to an address by Rev. Nehemiah Boynton, D. D. The next evening a similar meeting was held at the Tompkins Avenue Church in Brooklyn, and on Thursday, July 23, Dr. Clark and his family sailed for an absence of nearly a year abroad.

The Junior Societies in British Columbia are all in Vancouver, but so much interest was felt by their leaders in the presentation of the work at the British Columbia convention that they took many of their Juniors to Westminster, where the convention was held, and an entire program was given by the Juniors themselves. The annual address of the president laid especial emphasis on the matter of systematic beneficence. A circus reached the city on Sunday morning during the convention, and at the sunrise meeting plans were made for evangelistic work among the employés. Twenty-five Endeavorers conducted a helpful open-air meeting, which led to another meeting in the evening, and many of those connected with the circus went to the evening session of the convention.

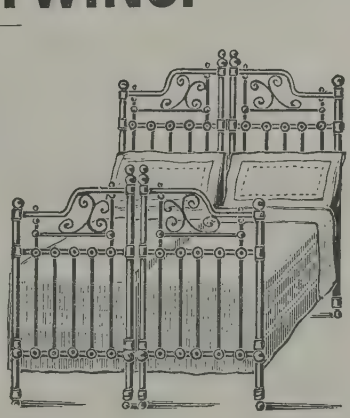
RELATED TWINS.

Twin Beds are each year more strictly demanded by social usage and custom. For every single pair we sold two years ago, we sold half a dozen last year, and shall sell a dozen this season.

We have Twin Beds now in every style and at every degree of cost. From the simple pair in enameled white iron and brass at $9 up to the elaborately carved twins in San Domingo mahogany, there is a wide range of election.



One of the popular novelties of this spring has been the united pattern in twin bedsteads, as shown in the accompanying engraving. Here the two beds are treated as one complete design, and the effect of increased size is thus happily avoided. Although taking a slightly larger space than a double bedstead, the appearance of "room filling" furniture is not to be noted.

We believe that any person who will price some of our twin bedsteads will surely purchase a pair. They are much lower than the usual cost.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

When the country is in the throes of political turmoil, not too much can be expected in the way of general trade. And such turmoil! Not since 1860 has there been a presidential election fraught with the vital consequences of the one which is to come off next November. It is useless to pooh-pooh the silver party by calling them cranks, demagogues and repudiators.

That the free silver craze is spreading there is no manner of doubt, and even here in the East, which was regarded as absolutely loyal to gold, one can hear silver talk on all sides, and not from the rabble either, but from educated men of affairs who, moreover, have a stake in the country, as it is called. In the writer's judgment, this craze for the white metal is simply the protest of the great common people against the growing power and arrogance of the money kings. The masses are discontented with the actions and policies of Wall Street and the Chicago grain pit, with the scandals in American railway and manufacturing corporations, and the reckless use of the people's money in all that pertains to speculation and modern financiering.

Nor is this discontent peculiar to America alone. The same determined rebuke to the stock-broking, financial community found expression in Germany in the Bourse Bill, and in France and England in other measures aimed at the breaking of the increasing power of these speculators. The great bankers here have adopted the surest means to excite the opposition of the plain people, by forcing the Government to make such enormous sacrifices to maintain gold payments, the very thing that these same bankers are now preserving of their own volition when their interests are actually threatened. Had they done in the beginning what they, within a couple of weeks, agreed to do on their own account, much suffering, hard times, and a large increase in the national debt would have been avoided.

As to general trade, the dullness in nearly all industrial and commercial lines is something more than the usual midsummer inactivity. The prospects indicate a further reduction in prices for iron and steel, the steel pool having met in New York the latter part of last week to make a last effort to prevent any further break in the price of billets.

At all the large centers there are complaints of the movement in dry goods, shoes and clothing. In lumber the trade is all but demoralized, and prices are on a very low basis. Nothing of an encouraging nature can be said of wool or woolens or the cotton manufacturing industry, except that the heavy curtailment in production will probably avert utter demoralization in values. Bank clearings last week aggregated $881,000,000 for the whole country, or about eight per cent. less than in the corresponding week last year.

THE NEWER SOURCES OF WEALTH.

Some idea of the increase of the world's wealth in the comparatively brief time in which electricity has been employed as a commercial agent may be gained from the estimates of expert authorities, which were laid before some of those who attended a meeting of electrical engineers in New York on the day of the opening of the electrical exposition. It was then stated that the best estimate was that the commercial use of this force had, within a comparatively short period running back to about the beginning of the Civil War, created wealth equivalent in money to not far from $2,000,000,000. That is to say, that in forty years the wealth directly created by the employment of this force commercially approximates that created by railway development extending over a period of nearly seventy years in this country. Mr. Edison was asked a few years ago if he had ever made any estimate of the wealth created by the employment of electricity for lighting purposes, a use of the force which began not much more than fifteen years ago. He replied that it would probably be represented in dollars by not less than 200 000,000, that his own inventions gave employment to more than 150,000 persons, and probably supported twice that number, and that his own share in the development of this great wealth and in the employment of this vast army had been a little less than $3,000,000. —Philadelphia Press.

MRS. HARRIETTE DAY FOSTER.

Mrs. Harriette Day Foster, wife of Rev. Addison P. Foster of Roxbury, Mass., after a lingering and painful illness of over two years, died Aug. 1, aged fifty-six years. She was the daughter of the late Sherebiah B. Day, Esq., of West Springfield, Mass., and niece of the late Rev. Pliny B. Day, D. D., of Hollis, N. H., and of the late Henry Day, Esq., of New York. She was a descendant of the Pilgrim stock, tracing back her ancestry to several who came over in the Mayflower. She became in consequence an enthusiastic student in genealogy and Pilgrim history. Possessed of an active mind and being an invalid for several years she found relief from pain in searching ancient records and collecting photographs. This led her into a wide correspondence both in this country and in England. Her collection of photographs reproducing the scenes connected with Pilgrim matters she gathered in three large volumes devoted to England, Holland and America respectively, and accompanied by a carefully written historical description. This collection is probably unequaled in the world and has excited much attention from historical specialists. Much disturbed that Myles Standish, her ancestor, should be represented by some as a Roman Catholic, to controvert this position she wrote an article, which was printed and which has never been answered.

Mrs. Foster was a devoted student of the Bible. For many years in her husband's parishes in Jersey City and in Roxbury she was in the habit of giving Bible readings at ladies' meetings. These were greatly appreciated by those who heard them. As health and time allowed she engaged actively in church work, modestly and unobtrusively aiding her husband in the parish, and so came to be greatly loved and honored.

She was a devoted Christian of a practical, commonsense type. She loved prayer; she was untiring in efforts to mold the Christian characters of her children; she held firmly to a Puritan faith and to Puritan morals. Yet with all this there was a vein of humor in her composition. She believed that home should be made a place of cheer, and tried to keep those around her hopeful and happy. She lived to see two sons and two daughters grow out of childhood and connect themselves with the church, and she found her reward for a mother's care in their devotion to her during the years of her confirmed invalidism.

HAY FEVER.

A Discovery for This Malady at Last—Relief at Your Own Home.

No one but the sufferer from hay fever knows the agony that attends this torturing malady. A continual round of sneezing, eyes that are weak, watery and inflamed, a nose that runs without cessation, and grows more sore every hour, inability to breathe, nights that become hours of torture, days that are long drawn out and full of suffering—and all this continues until the sufferer is obliged to pack up and go to some locality where this disease does not thrive. Formerly it was considered that the only way hay fever could be relieved was by a change of climate, the mountains of New Hampshire being noted as one of the best places in the world for this purpose. Now it is known by physicians and patients alike that sufferers of this trouble can be relieved at home by the use of X-Zalia. The preparation is an entirely new discovery in medicine, its merits for the relief of hay fever only becoming known within the last year or two.

X-Zalia is made from the sap of a certain tree, combined with other vegetable ingredients found in New Hampshire, and contains the necessary medicinal properties that have made New Hampshire air famous for the virtuous qualities it contains for the cure of this disease. Many sufferers who were skeptical have tried X-Zalia, and, to their surprise, found relief. Among those who may be referred to are Mr. W. F. Lakin, manager Consolidated Store Service Company, Fiske Building, State St., Boston; Mr. George E. Armstrong, of the firm of Clark, Ward & Co., bankers, Equitable Building, Boston; Mr C. H. Stevens, Phillips Building, Boston; Mr. Walter L. Frost, 8 Congress St., Boston; Mrs. Wm. F. Richardson, 12 Elm St., South Framingham, Mass.; U. S. Senator J. H. Gallinger, New Hampshire.

It is expensive to take a long trip to the mountains for relief. It does not cost you much to try X Zalia right here at home, and be convinced as to whether it does what is claimed for it or not. Ask your druggist for X-Zalia. If he does not keep it send $1 to The X-Zalia Company, No. 3 Beacon St., Boston, Mass., and they will send one of their largest bottles, express paid, anywhere on line of railroad in the United States.

THE FREE COINAGE OF SILVER AND GOLD.

The director of the United States Mint, Washington, is authority for the following statements, which he has prepared and printed to meet the unparalleled demand upon him from the people for light on the great economic aspect of the campaign now being waged:

All standard silver dollars coined by the mints of the United States since the passage of the act of Jan. 18, 1837, have been coined in the ratio of one to 15.9884, generally called the ratio of one to sixteen—15.9884 being very nearly sixteen. Still, to reach accurate results, the former and not the latter figure must be used in calculation. The ratio is obtained in this way:

The silver dollar contains 371.25 grains of pure silver and the gold dollar 23.22 grains of pure gold. If you divide 371.25 by 23 22 you will get the ratio of weight between a gold dollar and a silver dollar—that is, 15.9884. It is true that to be on a par with gold silver would (at our ratio) be worth $1.2929. The reason is this—a gold dollar contains 23.22 grains of pure gold. In an ounce, or 480 grains, of gold there are as many dollars as 23 22 is contained times in 480, or one ounce. If you divide 480 by 23 22 you get $20 67, the number of dollars that can be coined out of an ounce of pure gold; in other words, the money equivalent of one ounce gold or of 15.9884 ounces of silver at the ratio of one to 15.9884. Now, if 15.9884 ounces of silver be worth $20.67, one ounce will be worth $1.2929, as you can prove by simple division. The same result is obtained by dividing 480 grains or one ounce of silver by 371 25, the number of grains of pure silver in a standard silver dollar, at the ratio of one to 15.9884, which gives $1.2929.

Sixteen ounces of pure silver will coin a little more than one ounce of gold; 15.9884 ounces of silver will coin exactly the same amount of money as one ounce of gold—that is, $20.67. You can prove this by dividing 15 9884 ounces by 371.25 grains. The operation is as follows: 15.9884 multiplied by 480, divided by 371.25, equals 20 674.

It is not true that sixteen ounces of silver will coin only $16.80 at the ratio of one to sixteen.

As will be seen above, one ounce of silver will coin $1.2929. Multiplying $1.2929 by sixteen gives $20.68. You can make the same result in another way—sixteen ounces troy, or 7,680 grains, divided by 371 25, gives the number of silver dollars that can be coined out of sixteen ounces of silver; 7,680, divided by 371 25, equals 20.68.

What is meant by the free coinage of silver?

The right of individuals to deposit standard silver in any amount at the mints and have it coined into full legal tender coins.

What is meant by the ratio of sixteen to one?

The ratio in coinage of sixteen to one means that sixteen ounces of pure silver coined shall have the same value as one ounce of pure gold coined, namely, $20.67.

What is meant by bimetallism?

The unlimited coinage of both gold and silver on private account into full legal tender coins.

What is meant by single standard, gold or silver?

That only one metal shall be coined on private account into full legal tender coins, and that only the favored metal shall be coined without limit.

To travel is a pleasant and profitable diversion, and New England with its widely varying interests is a region through which one may tour indefinitely, and no matter which way you tour pleasing and interesting sights are always to be found. The White Mountains of northern New England are marvelously attractive, and the "Notch," the "Flume," the "Glen" or the "Summit" are but a few of the many features of this wonderful region which you should visit. To one sojourning hereabouts many drives or walks over mountain and dale may be taken, reaping a harvest of pleasure unequaled in these parts; likewise the opportunities for enjoyment that are afforded at the beach resorts are manifold, and the bathing, boating and fishing facilities attract many vacationists. In no other region can you find so comfortable quarters as those of the hosteiries of northern New England, which are homelike and commodious. The cuisine is invariably of the best, and the service fully equal to that of the metropolitan hotels. During the summer season the Boston & Maine Railroad sells round trip tickets to all mountain, seashore and lake resorts of northern New England and the Maritime Provinces at reduced rates, and the excursion book which is issued by the general passenger department of the Boston & Maine, and which is sent free of expense to applicants, includes a complete hotel and boarding house list, together with routes and rates to all principal points.

SAPOLIO

CURRENT THOUGHT.

AT HOME.

Mayor Josiah Quincy of Boston, in the August North American Review, says, with truth: "It is the duty of conservative men, even though they have shrunk from the idea of assuming any share of the responsibility for the Chicago platform, with its possibilities, at least, of immense disaster to the country, to endeavor to understand the spirit and purpose behind the radical political program which has now been put forward, to appreciate the strength of the forces back of it, and especially to do whatever may be possible during the coming campaign to prevent political division from running on sectional or class lines."

The August Forum is valuable especially for its articles by C. S. Gleed of Topeka and T. S. Van Dyke of Los Angeles, Cal., showing that the West has men competent to deal ably and fairly with Eastern critics and local sophists. J. B. Bishop, in an article on The Social and Economic Influence of the Bicycle, says its "effects are remarkable enough to justify the frequent assertion that as a sociological revolutionary force the bicycle is without an equal. It is the first force of the kind which has damaged simultaneously the church and the theater. . . . One curious effect, which should afford some consolation to Sabbatarians, is that theaters in certain cities which were formerly open on Sundays have been closed permanently. . . . Of no other form of popular exercise or excursion can it be said that it is so conducive to good manners, simple conduct and kindly intercourse. . . . Fathers are made the companions of their sons as they seldom or never were before, and the beneficial influence upon the character and habits of the latter, exerted, as it often is, at the formative period of the boys' lives, cannot be overestimated. . . . Saloon keepers say that they suffer with others, that their saloons are deserted on pleasant evenings, and that riders who visit them take only beer and 'soft drinks.'"

The Watchman, interpreting The Real Issue of the present campaign, says: "We may concede all that may be personally claimed for the influence of demagogism, for the hatred of the debtor to the creditor and for the new desires, provoking discontent, which the advance of civilization has generated; but, depend upon it, the master secret of the present movement is the purpose to use the powers of government for the ends which will serve the interests of a class, as it is alleged they have been used to serve the interests of another class. Who shall say, in the face of uncontroverted facts, that these charges are baseless and that the alleged grievances have no just foundation?"

The Christian Advocate, commenting on the significance of the movement which was begun in and about Gainsborough, Eng., and commemorated last month by English and American Congregationalists, calls attention to the fact that "it was John Sobieski of Poland who checked the victorious advance of the Turks to the overthrow of Christianity and the conquest of Western Europe; John Huss, that reformer before Luther; John Calvin, who held Geneva against the papacy; John Knox, who fought Presbyterianism into permanent being in Scotland; John Robinson, who gave character and direction to the movement of the Pilgrims; and John Wesley, who raised up Methodism. Deduct Presbyterianism, Congregationalism and Methodism from the visible sources of Christianity, and how great would be the diminution! And had the Turks been unchecked, who can fancy what would today be the state of Christianity?"

The Christian Register asks: "To what crisis of agony must our fellow-human beings be tortured before the commanding voice and the uplifted arm of this great republic, in the name of common humanity and simple justice, compel the inhuman Spanish war fiends to curb their barbarous atrocities? Almost within earshot of our homes the shrieks of women and children are blending with the war cries of their murderers. . . . Whatever may be the claims of Spain in forcing a distasteful and tyrannical rule upon the inhabitants of Cuba, and however reluctant our Government may be to interfere in behalf of political freedom for that oppressed people, surely the inhuman barbarities to which Spain now resorts constitute an appeal to the holiest ties of human fellowship, which can only be ignored at the sacrifice of national manhood."

DEMOCRACY.

In The Nineteenth Century for May Rt. Hon. John Morley, replying to Mr. Lecky's recent assault on democracy, says:

Whether as another name for universal suffrage, or as another name for a particular stage of civilization, it equally stands for a remarkable revolution in human affairs. In either sense it offers a series of moral and political questions of the highest practical importance and the most invigorating theoretical interest. It has shaken the strength and altered the attitude of the churches, has affected the old subjection of women and modified the old conceptions of the family and of property, has exalted labor, has created and dominated the huge enginery of the press, has penetrated in a thousand subtle ways into the whole region of rights, duties, human relations and social opportunity. . . . Nobody with an eye in his head believes that the accommodation of old social institutions to a state of society in which the political center of gravity has finally shifted is a completed task, or that the gravest problems involved in that task are not left outstanding and inexorable. . . .

Only a few weeks ago one of the two foremost of the free industrial communities of the world menaced the other with war, though the word itself has long been banished from the polite language of modern diplomacy. The second of these two communities a few days later, provoked by a dozen ill-chosen words which were believed to contain an aggressive intention, instantly flamed out in a blaze of anger, applauded flying squadrons and was as ready for arms as even was the aristocratic England of either the first or the second Pitt. And it is a singular and perplexing case of the irony of human things that today, after all Europe has been impregnated with democratic ideas and democratic institutions seem to enjoy a surely predestined triumph, the supreme keeper of the peace, the master in Western Europe and in Eastern diplomacy, should be the czar of Russia—Turkey at his feet, China ready to drop and France, the once radiant birthplace of all the immortal principles of '89, reduced to be a sort of Russian prefecture.

THE BIBLE.

Marvelous book! Itself also a subject or a parallel of every miracle and deliverance recorded in its pages. Proscribed and imprisoned, the angel of deliverance illumined the darkness, stripped off the shackles and awed into conscious obedience the self-opening doors. Exiled, it has created a new kingdom and shifted the center and balance of power. Carried away captive, it has broken down rival altars and overthrown false gods till the right of way has been accorded to it by friend and foe. Sold into bondage by false brethren, it has captured the hearts of its masters and ascended the throne of dominion. Driven into the sea, it has gone over dry shod, seeing its enemies overwhelmed in the flood and itself singing the glad song of deliverance. Burned on the public square by the public executioner, it has risen sphinxlike and floated away in triumph, wearing the smoke of its own funeral pyre as a flag of victory. Scourged from city to city, it has gone through the capitals of the civilized world, leaving behind it a trail of light attesting its divine authority. Cast into the lepers' pesthouse, it has purified the scales of contagion, restored the soft pink skin of smiling infancy, quickened the energies of romping youth, and recreated the sinews of heroic manhood. Betrayed by a kiss, it has stood erect in the calm majesty of eternity, amid the swarming minions of its enemies. Nailed to a felon's cross, it has illumed the darkness by the radiance of its own glory, and transformed the summits of sacrifice into a throne of universal judgment. Sealed into the gloom of a sepulcher, it has come forth with the echoing footsteps of Almighty God, rising to dominion over all intelligences. Marvelous book! Full of divine life and power. No one can touch even the hem of its garment without being healed. No one can come near enough even to stone it without being blessed. It stands alone, without a rival—even its enemies themselves being judges.—Bishop Chas. Fowler.

THE MODERN THEOLOGUE.

The Yale Weekly contrasts the theological student of today with the theologue of the past:

It is given to the layman's eye to notice a change which is as interesting as it is refreshing. It is a change of outward appearance, but it is significant. The theological student of today does not, if we may so speak, carry the insignia of his profession quite as conspicuously as in the older days. Certain conventionalities of dress were always insisted upon, with a regularity which used to be almost monotonous, and which seemed to indicate that the man thus appareled from morning till night, seven days in the week, was above all things a theological student. He might be, and very often was, in spite of this and other indications, very much a man among men; but that was not the point which he seemed to wish to emphasize.

Without criticising this habit, one may call it an interesting fact that it is very much less easy to pick out a theological student among the university's army of young men than it was a few years ago. This indicates a participation in the life of the community, which is identical with a similar change in the outside world, where the minister is not trying to keep himself aloof from everyday affairs, but is refusing to allow others to keep him from his share in the life of every vigorous man and citizen.

MONEY AND BANKING, published by Ginn & Co., is sent postpaid on receipt of sixty-five cents instead of fifty cents, as stated in their advertisement in last issue.

A CURIOUS HEADING.—Some of the advertisements in this paper are notable for their interesting and unique headings, but of none is this more true than of the interesting announcements of the Paine Furniture Company. Readers of this issue who suddenly encounter, in another column, the words "related twins," in large type, may wonder whether it is an announcement of a legacy which is seeking an heir, or a stray twin searching for his long-lost brother. In reality it is neither, but a clever announcement of the united pattern in twin bedsteads, which the Paine Furniture Company are offering as a novelty of the present season.

THE business year of the American Board closes Sept. 1, and as the time approaches its friends watch the receipts with prayerful solicitude, hoping that, notwithstanding the business depression, contributions will come in during the remaining two or three weeks sufficient in amount to enable the Board to close its year without a new debt. If this desirable result can be accomplished it will bring encouragement to every burdened and toil-worn worker in our foreign field. The year closing has been an unusually trying one from the point of view of finances, owing to the strenuous and finally successful effort to lift the debt, and to the natural diversion of some funds for Armenian relief which might otherwise have gone to the regular work of the Board. Its regular receipts for the eleven months ending July 31 were $523,953, as over against $550,835 in the same period in 1895. Send in your gifts at once, brethren, that the year may close with all obligations fully met.

Previous issues of our annual educational number have brought us many commendations, but we venture to regard this week's edition as still more deserving of favor. Certainly it will well reward a careful reading. We have aimed to make it of interest and service not only to those who are professionally concerned with educational problems and movements, but to the great army of our readers who have a personal interest in such matters. Parents who have children at school or college, and pupils of almost every grade, will find suggestion and stimulus, while the general reader will be made aware of the close and vital connection between the educational institutions of the country and all that makes for the welfare of the home, the State and the individual.

Mr. Winship's article will encourage all friends of our present public school system; Mr. Putnam makes it evident that the best librarians today consider their office a public trust. Mr. Buckham's plea for the larger recognition of the Bible in the colleges will find many a responsive chord. The conspicuous solitariness in which Miss Quint stands as a feminine Master of Arts gives a peculiar zest to her article. The story of Armour Institute reveals the possibilities for good which lie in the possession of great wealth, while the description of such summer assemblies as those at Northfield, Chautauqua and Worcester open to view the special educational advantages with which every recurring summer is more and more prolific. Educational themes are made the subject of timely editorials, and the page of brief paragraphic note and comment will be found as instructive as any of the forty-eight.

We can sympathize in these torrid days with the bold image of the Hebrew poet who calls Jehovah in the climax of his song "a shadow from the heat." Patience is sorely tried in August experiences and does not always overcome. To many, we suppose, faith in God seems an ill-assorted remedy for the suffering which our summer atmosphere, blazing with sunlight and charged with moisture to the saturation point, causes to mortals. And yet it is the best of remedies. The words of the old Book are true, and God is still a shadow from the heat. At least he enables us to overcome impatience, if his breezes do not blow to bring us immediate outward relief. Faith in God rids us of haste and worry, and haste and worry are the coadjutors of heat. It is well in sultry days to take as a command and literally the promise, "He that believeth shall not make haste"; and there never is a better opportunity to practice casting all our care upon him who careth for us than when we are tempted to translate discomfort into anxiety. A quiet mind and busy hands are the best remedies for heat impatience, and these grow out of and accompany true faith in God.

In this critical and hypersensitive age there really ought to be some method devised for the expression of quotation marks in spoken language. The speaker cannot well stop the flow of his words for acknowledgment, and, if he is of a squeamish conscience, may be tempted to deny himself sadly-needed quotations, or be compelled to the sad experience of Mr. Candidate Bryan, who has just been obliged to put quotation marks to the most effective part of his convention speech in the printed and authorized edition. This peroration, which proves also to be a quotation, applying the incidents of our Lord's crucifixion to the uses of a political campaign, we cannot help thinking unfortunate from the lips of a Christian man in such conditions, and, as it seems likely to play a large part in the campaign, we desire to protest before the battle waxes hot and the participants become deaf to remonstrance against the threatened abuse of sacred names and images. The crown of thorns and cross of suffering are not emblems to be paraded through the streets by political clubs and torchlight processions in the interest of any merely political preaching.

Mr. Buckham's article in this week's issue, on Biblical Study in the Colleges, presents a problem involving many difficulties which have found only partial solution even in the most favorable cases which he considers. The fact is that some general acquaintance with the essentials of Bible history and with the devotional portion of the Scriptures should find a place in the course of preliminary education. To enforce this we do not see why our colleges might not add to their list of requirements for admission such a one as this: "Also an acquaintance with the facts in the life of Abraham, Moses, David, Isaiah, Jesus and Paul, as narrated in the English Bible." Surely the knowledge of these facts is as important to a right use of college opportunities as acquaintance with the career of Cæsar or of Xenophon. And the rudiments of Bible history ought not to take up the time of professors or of students in the college years.

COMPULSORY WORSHIP IN OUR COLLEGES.

The periodical agitation of this question arises, in our judgment, more from the fact that each generation of college students feels called upon to ventilate its opinions on the matter than from any inherent probability that the traditional policy of our Christian colleges is to be modified in the near future. Since the days when collegians were obliged to attend daily prayers at five o'clock in the morning and evening devotions as well, besides two or three services on Sunday, there has been a considerable and an extremely desirable advance in the direction of freedom. Few colleges now require attendance more than once on Sunday, and the hour for morning prayers is a reasonable one. The liturgical and musical elements have been greatly improved, and in a number of institutions some of the best preachers in the country are heard during the course of a year.

Nevertheless, despite these marked concessions to the spirit of the age, we find a prevailing disposition among the students at Williams and Amherst and at other institutions to demand the total abolishment of compulsory worship. Almost every week the college papers indicate the existence of this feeling, and the sentiment has in more than one instance crystallized in petitions to the trustees, to which have been affixed the names of a very large proportion of the undergraduates. In this way a large problem is thrust constantly upon the attention of those who are responsible for the administration of these colleges, while the more or less continuous agitation of the subject cannot fail to affect in many particulars the internal life of the college community.

In behalf of free worship certain respectable and now somewhat well-worn arguments can certainly be advanced. The word "free" has a captivating sound in the ears of some persons, whether applied to the coin of the realm or to personal habits and conventional usages. But unless the optional system becomes operative from the very beginning of the Freshman year, we cannot see why the student should object more strongly to being compelled to attend worship than recitations. If his intellectual life is subjected somewhat to times and seasons, it is not an invasion of personal liberty to appoint safeguards for his spiritual life. College sentiment on that point ought not to be altogether decisive. It is easy for a few outspoken men to create and sustain a wave of feeling before which the more timid and conservative minds are swept along. But it is a noticeable fact that when men have been out of college half a dozen years, or even less, they not infrequently change their minds and become earnest advocates of the compulsory system. It is quite possible that the youth of eighteen or twenty may not be quite so wise as his parents, guardians, or teachers as respects what is best for him physically, intellectually and spiritually.

We think the cases where students are harmed by attendance on compulsory services are extremely few. A great many of them are expected to attend services when at home on vacations; why should all restrictions be thrown aside during term time? Nor can any one who has had no religious training and inherits no religious feeling suffer greatly in being required to begin each day by participating in a short and helpful service of worship. He must be a very weak and narrow man who is thereby alienated from the religious life and made a bitter critic of religious forms and institutions.

We should be sorry to see college authorities yielding to the clamor of undergraduates. Harvard is so essentially different in its internal life from most of our colleges that the fact that free worship has been established there cannot be cited as proof that it would work happily under other conditions. We agree entirely with President Franklin Carter of Williams, who, in his last Commencement report touching upon the agitation of the matter among his own students, says: "Whatever may be the ultimate solution of the religious problem for the New England colleges, the almost universal usage still prevailing clearly shows that the managers of these institutions do not believe that the method adopted by Harvard (in regard to the success of which very diverse testimony is received) is sure to promote elsewhere the best interests of the organism as a whole."

REDEEMING THE HARD TIMES.

That we have fallen upon evil days financially even the most rose-colored spectacles are powerless to conceal. From the capitalist, in whose brow the furrows deepen hourly as he anxiously scans the political horizon and the bulletins from Wall Street, to the bootblack, who sees with dismay some of his most reliable customers grow increasingly prone to do their own "shining," in every life this dread fact, like the ominous muttering of an earthquake, continually asserts itself above the surface chatter of ordinary social intercourse. Nor is the department of religious work exempt from this element of unrest. From various sources, both at home and abroad, come tidings of unpaid ministers, churches with closed doors, restricted gifts and abandoned enterprises—all for lack of financial support. A dollar has no more purchasing power in an ecclesiastical treasury than in a restaurant or a railway train. We cannot make bricks without straw. Shall we therefore abandon the struggle, lose all interest in our fellowmen and devote our energies to the furtherance of our own comfort and advantage? Shall we stop doing and giving because the Jumbo of hard times has stepped on our personal pocketbook and the bottom of the church treasury has dropped out? Is spiritual famine an inevitable result of a scarcity of money? Or is all this stress and strain divinely permitted, to test our loyalty, to develop powers hitherto unknown or unused, to show us that the mighty dollar is not *al*mighty, and that the kingdom of God moves forward to perfection independently of the fluctuations of the stock market?

Let us glance for a moment at the reverse side of the shield. Into a little Western town, blighted by crop failure for nine successive years, where four years ago the discouraged church discontinued services, comes a man of God with sufficient faith and courage to breathe new life into these disheartened laborers. He talks with the people in their homes; he bears them aloft on the wings of prayer; they crowd through the now open church door; their hearts melt in repentance and exult with a sense of sins forgiven; they join hands in God's service. A Sunday school is organized; an Endeavor Society quickly follows; and, like a host of armed warriors springing up in a night, an army of workers arises, poor as ever in this world's goods, but rich in a faith, fellowship and purpose which poverty and temptation are powerless to destroy.

The women of a church in a prominent Southern city, to help in raising its debt, have pitched a tent on the lawn, where delicious ice cream and home-made cake are served and orders taken for supplying them in quantity at homes. A woman's missionary society in the Interior buys commutation tickets to the nearest large city and rents them at less than the rate of single fare, dividing the profit between the buyer and the church—an arrangement entirely within the rules of the railway company. While the church is not primarily a money-making institution—nor should it be made such—yet the business principles of industry, economy and enterprise are just as creditable to a religious organization as to an individual. Indeed, they are infinitely preferable to debt.

Take the single item of vacation supplies. Strong city churches ordinarily pay from twenty-five to fifty dollars per Sunday for the ablest and best trained preachers obtainable, and keenly enjoy the privilege of hearing them. This year three churches in a New England city, whose hearts were larger than their bank accounts, unable without retrenchment to give as generously toward the debt of the American Board as they wished, emptied their purses into its treasury, at the same time agreeing to hold union services during the summer, thus saving two-thirds the cost of supplies. Another church arranges open conferences for summer Sunday evenings, choosing topics of popular interest. Still others—one in California we have specially in mind—invites educated laymen of unquestioned piety to fill its pulpit during the pastor's vacation.

Shall we not, then, work on hopefully and give with a liberal hand so long as we have means, though in order to make up the deficiency we must economize, co-operate, study our resources and develop all our powers? And if our bank account be exhausted we are not left empty-handed. We can still offer consecrated hearts and brains, remembering that the gift of God is not to be purchased with money. So shall even a lean treasury be made to yield rich spiritual fruitage.

> Who liveth best? Not he whose sail,
> Swept on by favoring tide and gale,
> Swift wins the haven fair;
> But he whose spirit strong doth still
> A victory wrest from every ill;
> Whose faith sublime
> On every cloud a rainbow paints—
> 'Tis he redeems the time.

AMERICAN HONOR IN TURKEY.

That public opinion is by no means satisfied with the relations of our Government with Turkey was made further manifest at Chautauqua last week by the unanimous adoption in one of its assemblies of a telegram to the President of the United States, reading as follows:

> Four thousand American citizens assembled at Chautauqua, indignant at the outrages committed on our fellow-countrymen at Harpoot, Turkey, ten months ago, and distressed by the fact that no indemnity nor satisfaction has yet been secured, respectfully urge you to use every means in your power to maintain the rights of our fellow-citizens and uphold the dignity of the United States in that land.

Among other matters not adjudicated between the American and Turkish foreign offices are the claims for indemnity for person and property referred to in this telegram, and the yet more urgent matter of the imprisonment of Mr. Knapp upon charges absurdly vague or evidently mendacious. Is it too much to ask that these matters should be urged to a conclusion, and that the delays and excuses of the Turk should no longer be listened to with patience?

We have already expressed our dislike of ill-advised attempts to force the President's hand by indiscreet appeals to popular assemblies, but with the respectful tone and the essential purpose of this telegram we are in full sympathy. While we are aware that Minister Terrell has gone back to Constantinople fresh from an interview with his chief and under pledge of action, and wish him to have a fair chance to carry out his instructions, nevertheless we feel that the honor of America is suffering by too long delay of redress for the suffering and losses of its imperiled citizens in Turkey.

This Administration can act decisively in international relations, as the President's message on the Venezuela boundary plainly showed, and nothing but prompt and decisive action will, in the long run, win the respect of the Turkish Government and make life safe for Americans residing in its territory. To such determined and decisive action we believe the Porte would yield, and a vexatious question would be settled to the permanent honor and advantage of America in the East.

THE HYMNS OF THE CHURCH.

Next to the Scriptures and the habit of prayer, probably the hymns of the church have done more than any other agency to unite Christian hearts and to promote their growth in grace. Doubtless there are some to whom they are of equal value with even these. They embody so much of spiritual experience, they are so rich in consolation and cheer, they incite to such noble and holy endeavor, that they touch and inspire the hardest hearts. Nowhere else do we read the history of Christianity written in such fascinating and impressive terms. Nothing else so enables us to appreciate that all true believers are one with other, with the multitude of the redeemed on high, and with Jesus Christ himself. Without them our worship would seem barren and often vain, and our private spiritual life would be deprived of one of its most stimulating and delightful influences.

The prevailing type of any one's piety may be discovered readily from his favorite hymns, and it is worth notice that the simplest hymns often are popular with the most cultured Christians, and that the stateliest and most finished, considered from the literary and artistic points of view, are favorites with the common people. This is because they are genuine hymns, true to human nature, expressive of its actual needs, fears, hopes and joys. They are not artificial and merely made to order. They embody sentiments of which we all are conscious.

It is something to be thankful for that there are so many really fine hymns, and also that so many hymns, which in whole or in part are not of the best, have been so fruitful of blessing. A high standard ought to be maintained but not in a finical spirit. Thousands have found spiritual help in hymns which in themselves are open to severe criticism, but which at least have trained people to love sacred song and often to prefer the best quality of it.

It is an old saying that the devil cannot abide a good hymn and flees when he hears one. Certainly, nothing else except prayer is a more trustworthy source of help in sore temptation or sorrow. It is well for us all, even for those who cannot sing, to familiarize ourselves with good hymns, for they are a ceaseless source of comfort and strength.

CURRENT HISTORY.

"Unprecedented" Heat.

When the mercury persistently remains among the nineties day after day, and perspiring humanity precipitates itself by thousands to the seashore or seeks in vain for cool uplands, it is the most natural thing in the world to speak of "unprecedented" heat. Yet the weather record for July, a month which had some exceptionally torrid days, shows that the average temperature, in New England, at least, was less than two degrees higher than last year, and the variation for more than thirty years, taking the month as a whole, has been exceedingly slight. Probably August will register the same comfortable average, despite the fact that the last few days, particularly Sunday, have been almost unendurable. The number of deaths from heat in New York alone on Sunday exceeded seventy, with a record of 250 for the six days ending Monday night, while the prostration in Chicago, and throughout the entire West and South, has been equally unparalleled. Even Boston's famous east wind was not forthcoming and a high degree of humidity greatly increased the uncomfortableness. In extent of territory covered, in its continuance day after day and in excessive mortality the present hot spell may, indeed, be "unprecedented," but let us hope that the beneficent law of averages, at the end of the month, will bring comfort to those who now faint under the heat and burden of the day.

Mr. Bryan.

Spectacularly considered, the most striking event in the political arena the past week has been Candidate Bryan's journey from his home in Lincoln, Neb., to New York city. The ostensible purpose of his coming East just at this time is to receive at a great mass meeting in Madison Square Garden, Wednesday night, formal notification of his nomination. But both Mr. Bryan and his managers are acute enough to recognize the value of the trip in bringing him personally to the notice of a multitude of voters in many States. To that end receptions were arranged for him along the route, and wherever his train stopped for any length of time the crowd flocked to his car and in most instances were rewarded not merely by a glimpse of Mr. and Mrs. Bryan but by appropriate remarks by the presidential candidate which in more than one instance spun themselves out to a speech of considerable length. His utterances were not remarkable as a contribution to a candid and illuminating discussion of the great questions at issue, but were rather skillful and taking appeals to the prejudices of his hearers. It is evident that Mr. Bryan is bidding for the support of the Populists by endeavoring to make it appear that all the forces of intrenched wealth are in league against him and by showing that he has been raised up at this juncture to serve as a tribune of the people and to help right existing wrongs and abuses.

The Trend Among the Democrats.

The progress of the campaign makes more apparent and sharp cut the split in the Democratic party. The sentiment opposed to the Chicago platform and ticket has crystallized in a conference at Indianapolis attended by dissatisfied Democrats from all over the country, nearly every State in the Union being represented by men who have long been prominent in the party councils. After careful deliberation it was decided with general unanimity that a convention should be called at Indianapolis, Sept. 2, to formulate a platform upon which all sound money Democrats can stand and to nominate a ticket. This new organization has taken the name of the National Democratic party, and that veteran Democratic war horse, General Bragg of Wisconsin, appears to be the man most likely to receive the nomination for the presidency, if one is made, while his running mate may be General Buckner of Tennessee, who fought in the Confederate army. The possibility of such a combination indicates how complete has been the shifting of issues. If a Union general and a Confederate general are placed in nomination on the same ticket, it will appeal strongly to soldiers who fought on different sides in the Civil War. General Bragg considers his age an obstacle to his nomination, and, as he is not ambitious for political honors, would favor the choice of a man like Mr. Palmer of Illinois.

Curiosity as to President Cleveland's exact position has not been gratified by any deliverance on his part, though the intimation that Sec. Hoke Smith, whose paper has espoused free silver, is soon to retire from the Cabinet would indicate that the President was displeased with the course to which his cabinet officer has committed himself. There are also rumors that Secretary Lamont is about to cast in his lot with the Chicago nominee. Here in Massachusetts there is the prospect of a hard and earnest fight in behalf of the gold standard. Old and honored leaders of the Democratic party like ex-Mayor Prince and Charles Levi Woodbury are girding themselves for the fray, while the canvass of the Young Men's Democratic Club reveals adherence to the gold standard and opposition to the outcome of the Chicago convention on the part of a large proportion of the members of the club. George Fred Williams has not succeeded in carrying with him the younger and more thoughtful Democrats whom he once counted among his followers. The type of men now hurrahing for him and pointing to him as their popular idol certainly does not represent the things which the ablest, most patriotic and most intelligent young men who have in previous years allied themselves with the Democratic party believe in and for which they are still ready to fight.

South, East and West.

Other noteworthy developments of the week politically have been the sweeping victory of the Democrats in the Alabama election, their State ticket triumphing by a majority of over 40,000; the nomination by the Republicans of Michigan of Mayor Pingree of Detroit for governor, who has decided leanings toward free silver; the conclusion for the present of Chairman Hanna's conferences with Republican leaders in New York city and his return to Cleveland; and the convention of Maine Democrats to fill the vacancy for the head of the State ticket occasioned by the withdrawal of Mr. Winslow, who resigned on account of his lack of sympathy with the doings at Chicago. This second convention was a somewhat turbulent assembly, and the plucky little group of men who, under the leadership of Mr. W. H. Clifford of Portland, stood for honest money was finally hissed out of the meeting by the majority conscious of its power. The nominee for governor is Mr. Melvin P. Frank, and there will be an animated campaign for the next month, not because there is much hope on the part of the Democrats of carrying the State, but because they desire, through lessening the Republican majority, to further Bryan's cause throughout the country. Mr. Hanna has made a good impression in the East, showing himself to be a man of tact and breadth of sympathy. He has not, however, succeeded in calming the troubled Republican waters in New York State, the opponents of Platt being apparently determined to wage their warfare against him to the bitter end.

A Campaign of Education.

Indications multiply that this is not to be a campaign in which great mass meetings and oratorical pyrotechnics are to be the most influential factors as respects the final outcome. Conversation on the street corners and in other places where groups of men convene is likely to have a perceptible effect. For, as Mr. Reed said in another noble speech last week, after he was unanimously renominated for Congress: "Where you see two men engaged in animated colloquy the chances are that they are talking of the silver question." With his customary shrewdness and humor he went on to intimate that the probabilities were that neither knew very much about the real points at issue. To illumine people's minds several promising movements are now under way. The business men's non-partisan organization, which originated in Philadelphia, is getting a substantial foothold in Boston and other great cities. The appeal sent out by the campaign committee in charge of the movement in this city is signed by forty representative business men, about half of whom have heretofore voted the Democratic ticket and hundreds of business men are hastening to enroll themselves under the same banner. It is to be strictly an association of those who believe in a "prompt, decisive and vigorous campaign in behalf of sound money." Feeling is growing that there ought to be a systematic effort to enlighten people through relatively small meetings, to be addressed by college professors and others who have expert knowledge of questions of finance and who would be able to answer queries upon the subject. Such assemblies as these would prove quite as influential as the conventional campaign gathering addressed by politicians only. The Republican campaign book, a volume of over four hundred pages, has just made its appearance. It is replete with information and arguments with reference to the money question. Railroad companies and the proprietors of great manufacturing establishments are instituting measures to get before their employés the question at issue in its direct bearing upon their own wages and future prosperity.

A Break in the Markets.

The madness of speculation has seldom found a more flagrant example than in the failure for several million dollars of Moore Brothers, a Chicago firm of brokers. They had organized and were sustaining, among other industrial enterprises, the price of the stock of two corporations, the Diamond Match and New York Biscuit Companies. They had planned to hold the price of the stock up to a very high figure in the face of a declining market, and had succeeded in doing so by large speculative purchases carried on margins when the break came. For several weeks it is said that almost the entire business of the Chicago Stock Exchange had been in these specialties. So the crisis could only be met by closing the exchange altogether for an indefinite period—said to be likely to extend until September. A syndicate has been organized to purchase and carry these stocks at a fixed price, and a widespread panic extending, perhaps, beyond Chicago has thereby been averted. In the meantime the business of the two corporations goes on as usual. One is the great match monopoly which Mr. George Gould is fighting, the other controls many of the best known cracker bakers of the East. Partly influenced by this failure and the consequent distrust in speculative business on the exchanges, the prices of stocks have fallen largely and are now at the panic level, though showing signs of recovery. It is to be noted, however, that the Chicago Stock Exchange is comparatively a small affair, the speculative center of that market being the produce exchange whose business is the largest in the world.

The Land Bill Fiasco.

The English Government has been singularly unfortunate, or singularly maladroit, in handling its parliamentary business. With an unprecedented majority it has been obliged to abandon most of its bills, and now has been defeated in the House of Lords by the adoption of amendments to the one bill which it had succeeded in getting through the Commons. The Irish noble landlords hurried across the channel to load down the bill with amendments favorable to their own interests, while Lord Salisbury sat by in silence. This selfishness has aroused a Tory cry against the upper house which may hasten its downfall. The defeat is thought also to portend a change in the ministry, with the resignation of the two Balfours and others.

Li Hung Chang in England.

English public and governmental opinion seems to have changed with regard to the importance of the Chinese ex-premier's visit, and he has been received with marked demonstrations of respect by the queen and people. His speeches have been models of courtesy and diplomatic reserve, but their tone seems to have been entirely friendly and he has sought modifications of treaties which would, by increasing the Chinese custom duties, put money for defense into the imperial treasury. On their part the English ministers have demanded guarantees for internal reform and the security of English merchants and missionaries in China, which Li Hung Chang had no authority to grant. The relation of the British Government to its colonies seems to have been as much of a puzzle to him as it is to most foreigners. When he inquired about the treatment of his countrymen in Canada and Australia he was told that England could not coerce her colonies. The thought of an empire made up of a central island and a number of self-governing colonies seems to have been quite out of his range of imagination. An interesting incident of his stay in London was his visit to the statue of General Gordon, "Chinese Gordon," his acquaintance with whom goes back to the Tai-Ping rebellion which Gordon suppressed. He examined the statue and made a deep obeisance before it, decorating it with a wreath of purple flowers and laurel signifying victory and white flowers standing for unselfishness, inscribed, "To the soldier and friend of China—a tribute of respect from Li Hung Chang." Li Hung is expected to arrive in this country in the course of a fortnight, but will make a comparatively short stay.

Spain and Cuba.

The news from Cuba is as contradictory as ever, more so than ever if we take its American developments. On the one side, there are rumors of new filibustering expeditions organizing in the South and to be sent out in evasion of the President's proclamation and the activity of the law officers. On the other, it is announced that Capt.-General Weyler and the insurgent chiefs have reached an agreement for a truce, and possibly for a settlement. In the meantime apparently authentic news of burnings of crops and buildings and of murders continue and the island sinks deeper day by day into the pit of anarchy. The pressure of the effort to subdue the "ever faithful isle" has become well-nigh unbearable in Spain itself. Tax riots have broken out in many cities, and the republican propaganda, of which little or nothing has been heard of late, seems to have been actively resumed. It is said that the disorders have been fomented by agents of the Cuban insurgents who have supplied arms. In Valencia, on Sunday, the streets were placarded with posters reading, "Long live free Cuba." The Spanish Government still continues to excuse itself for its failure in Cuba by alleging the unfriendly attitude of the American people, and there have been renewed threats against Americans residing in Spain as well as talk of war in the Spanish newspapers, but the unpopularity of the government grows as the taxes are found more and more unbearable and no word comes of real success in Cuba.

Crete and Armenia.

The situation in Crete takes on more and more of the air of a crisis. By refusing the proposition of the Powers to join in a blockade of the island, England at once gives notice to Turkey that she does not propose to act as her supporter and leaves a door of hope for the Greeks, who are ready to stake their national existence upon interference. The German newspapers are extremely bitter in their denunciation of England for this refusal, but public opinion as well as statesmanship left Lord Salisbury no choice. From Heraklion in Crete come rumors of massacres and of anarchy in the city itself, where bands of Mohammedans are attacking the foreigners and the Christians. The Russian vice-consul is said to have been maltreated, and the reports are so serious that a British and a French warship have been ordered to proceed thither with all possible speed. Crete is a capital instance of the divisive power of religious quarrels. All the Cretans are of the same race, but the descendants of the perverts to Mohammedanism are as overbearing and cruel in their treatment of their Christian blood brothers as if they had been descendants of the original Turkish tribes. The threat which King George of Greece has openly made of abdication in case the Powers positively veto the union of Crete to Greece shows how strong the Greek feeling is. "No news" from Armenia has become more than ever good news since every mail brought us knowledge of new massacres, and there is nothing new this week—only the old tale of starvation and fear. It is said that there is a complete change of Russian purpose toward Turkey, however, which, if it proves to be authentic, will do more to solve the question than any pressure which could be brought to bear in Turkey itself. According to the story, authentic documents telling the story of the massacres somehow reached the czar's own hands, and after reading them he immediately sent for Prince Lobanoff and commanded him to secure pledges from the sultan that the massacres should cease and reforms be carried out. This, if true, arrays the strongest Power in the East against further trifling with the Armenian question. It must be said, however, that the influence of Russia with the Porte seems to have waned recently, and the effect of the czar's change of front may not be so immediately effective as it would undoubtedly have been last autumn. If the story is true, it certainly casts a strange light on the condition of responsibility in Russia that the one man who has the power should also have been the one man who was ignorant of what every intelligent person must have known.

The Matabele War.

Pluck and endurance still have their part to play in modern war, as is shown by the feat of Captain Llewellyn of the British forces in South Africa, who stood his ground alone for an indispensable minute in the face of an overwhelming rush of the Matabele impis or regiments and saved the machine gun, whose fire turned the apparent defeat into a victory. It is hoped that the battle in which this took place will prove decisive, as the Matabele forces engaged were among their very best, but at least one further battle will probably be necessary before the rebellion is finally suppressed. In the meantime the condition of "Rhodesia" is described as pitiable. Provisions are scarce and dear and those imported are at once absorbed for the needs of the army. Settlements have been abandoned, and settlers are withdrawing to the Transvaal and the Cape Colony, and the commercial company to which the development of the territory was intrusted seems likely to suffer financial losses as serious as its political difficulties on account of the Jameson raid.

IN BRIEF.

The Independent quotes Paul effectively against the claims of Pope Leo in his recent encyclical letter, as follows: "There is none other name under heaven among men but one whereby we may be saved, and that name is not Peter."

Preaching and listening were about equally trying experiences to the comparatively few faithful souls who ventured into the sanctuary last Sunday. But what a splendid chance the heated term affords for the practice of Christianity!

Two more of The Congregationalist's "pilgrims," Rev. L. L. Wirt and Rev. R. P. Hibbard, reached Boston last Saturday, full of enthusiasm over the trip. The name of Mr. O. C. Starrett was inadvertently omitted from the list of the first arrivals, mentioned last week.

The Examiner tells of a "feeble country church" in Watkins, N. Y., from which the seventeenth young man had just been ordained to the ministry. That is a record to be proud of, and we would like to hear of similar instances among our Congregational churches.

It is a curious comment on values that the latest one dollar silver certificate is worth a dollar and a quarter because it contains a misspelled word. The omission of a single "l" in the word "tranquillity" and the stoppage of the issue has added a value of twenty-five per cent. for collectors.

Let it be remembered with gratitude and admiration that Edward Farr, the engineer of the Reading locomotive, in the collision near Atlantic City two weeks ago, died at his post and was found with one hand on the throttle and the other on the air brake. "Be ye also ready, for ye know not at what hour your Lord cometh." "Here, moreover, it is required in stewards that a man be found faithful."

The Golden Rule calls attention to the fact that circulars bearing the Christian Endeavor monogram are in circulation, asking funds for the transportation of the Armenians to America, a scheme which it rightly calls "utterly impracticable." Congregational money to help the Armenians will be quickly transmitted through the assistant treasurer of the American Board, F. H. Wiggin, 1 Somerset Street, Boston.

Even in the demoralizing heats of August we think The Pilot might spare us the bad manners and worse uncharitableness of such a paragraph as the following: "'Is there another life?' asks Goldwin Smith in the July Forum. There is, Goldwin, but if you want to prepare for it you must get acclimatized in a warmer country than Canada, or avoid it by amending your principles." It is out of character as well as out of taste.

Men in church and state who are sacrificing principle to policy and following leaders in whom they have no confidence remind us of the speech of the clown in introducing his trick mule to the audience: "This, ladies and gentlemen, is the celebrated trick mule, Dot. After many years of effort I am able to say that I can make him do anything he wants to." After all, personal consistency and independence are among the best goods the market offers, even if the price seems high.

"Sport" is too often synonymous with cruelty, and we heartily indorse what the Springfield Republican says in comment upon a recent "sporting event":

"The birds were a splendid lot. Over 1,600 were killed." These are the humane sentiments expressed in one of the press dispatches about the trap-shooting tournament at Chicago. It may be sportsmanlike to force a pigeon into a box and then murder him with a shotgun when he tries to fly away, but we fail to see it.

Archbishop Langevin of Manitoba attempts to break the force of the revolt from clerical dictation in Quebec by saying that Laurier is a Roman Catholic, and that the Liberal candidates in the French constituencies were pledged to help the Manitoba Roman Catholics equally with the Conservatives. But this does not touch the real point, which is that the church authorities told the Roman Catholics of Quebec to vote one way and a large majority of them deliberately and with malice aforethought voted the other.

While the 8,000 delegates to the Milwaukee Convention of the Baptist Young People's Union seem but a fraction compared with the great C. E Convention at Washington, it is remembered by the delegates as "the greatest gathering of Baptists which the world has ever known," and as only a denominational and national, instead of interdenominational and world, convention it was certainly a splendid success. The report of the proceedings, just at hand, is an excellent detailed record of the four days of the meeting.

The sad news which came last week to a well-known Cambridge family of the accident and death of their son while mountain climbing in Canada calls to mind the bereavement which cast its shadow not long since over the Seelye family of Northampton at the death of a son as a consequence of a similar mishap on a much lower eminence. Whether scaling perilous hights alone, as in the latter case, or in company with others, as was young Mr. Abbott, the risks of mountain climbing are great and even the most scrupulous care of the climber for his own body or that of another may be, after all, without avail.

The Salvation Army believes in going out into the highways and hedges, or their city and slum equivalents, and "compelling them to come in." Its faith is often rewarded, and it is deserving of all honor for its enterprise. The latest plan for New York is to send ambulances around at night to pick up men who are too drunk to take care of themselves, bringing them to a shelter where they can rest and become sober. The army editors are developing an alliterative faculty, also, which would do credit to a circus poster man. The motto of a recent plan of organized help is "Soap, soup and salvation."

A striking coincidence was the unveiling at nearly the same time of memorials to Thomas Arnold and John Henry Newman, leaders both of the religious thought of England, but at the opposite poles of Christian belief. Arnold was the greatest of modern teachers, Newman exercised a powerful influence in and out of the pulpit. Arnold's bust finds a place in Westminster Abbey, where the men dearest to the heart of the English people are remembered; Newman's statue finds a place in a vacant lot in the vicinity of the oratory he founded in England in communion with a foreign church. The real power of each, it is well to remember, was based upon character.

Mr. Moody has been asked to conduct a conference in New York this fall on the general plan of the Bible Conference, now in session at Northfield, and has consented to attempt it. He will be assured of overflowing audiences, and much good will be done, but the sense of leisure and aloofness, which opens the way for the best impressions in the summer conferences, will, we fear, be lacking. The lesson of this power of thought in solitude need not be lost upon individuals, however, even if Northfield seems out of reach. Five unhurried minutes every day will be worth more spiritually to us than an hour of distracted thought and study, and at least five minutes reserved for God alone can hardly be outside the reach of any man.

The death of Bishop Arthur Cleveland Coxe is calling out stories of his stronger, if less elegant and learned, father, Samuel Hanson Cox, many of them spoiled in the telling. We are sorry to see The Mid-Continent, for example, miscalling the father, who was one of the greatest of Presbyterians a generation ago, "Dr. Coxe." One of the grounds upon which the father disapproved of the son was that he had added the weakening "e" to his name, and another that he had gone over to the Episcopal Church. We have heard the story so often that we assume that it must be authentic that Dr. Cox was once asked how many children he had, and answered, "Ten, madam. Five of them are wise, and five of them are Episcopalians." Bishop Coxe was fine looking, but the writer remembers Dr. Samuel Hanson Cox as one of the handsomest old men he has ever seen.

Rev. A. J. Lyman, D. D, of the South Church, Brooklyn, was the victim of a curious and almost unprecedented accident on his recent voyage across the Atlantic in the Lucania. When sound asleep one night his left arm was pressed against the metallic rail of his berth in such a way and for so long a time that the main trunk nerve in the arm suffered a temporary paralysis and became practically useless. Severe and prolonged pain ensued for the remainder of the voyage. Reaching Liverpool the Doctor put himself under the care of an eminent specialist and obtained, after a time, considerable relief, though recent private letters reveal the fact that he is practically a prisoner at Morley's Hotel in London, having abandoned altogether his intention to visit Cornwall and Wales. He has been dependent upon others for assistance in dressing and in taking his meals, but has experienced the utmost kindness from all his fellow-travelers and maintains a cheerful outlook even although all his plans for the summer are completely frustrated. Ocean traveling would possess additional terrors for the timid if an accident like Dr. Lyman's were not a good deal more rare than a collision with an iceberg.

Nothing is stable in this world except God's purpose and authority, and least of all can the value of commodities be absolutely fixed. The best we can do is to accept one commodity as a measure of the value of the others, and, by choosing that which is least liable to fluctuations of quantity and demand, reach an approximation to stability. The measuring rod in this country by law is a given weight of gold which the Government will weigh and stamp for any man and which for the convenience of giving it a name we call a dollar. But gold varies in value from day to day and the standard for measuring values with it. By changing to a given quantity of silver we should have a standard which varied more freely still. By attempting to use both we should have in practice only the one which self-interest would induce men to use—that is, the cheaper. The world goes round the sun with tolerable regularity in spite of the fact that the sun is moving, but if the world should attempt to go round two suns proceeding at irregular and constantly changing rates of motion its consequent wobbling would inevitably make us dizzy. The advantage of the gold standard is not that it is unchangeable, but that it is in practice the most nearly fixed measure of value for all other commodities which the world has yet discovered.

The Public Library and the Common School.

By Herbert Putnam.

Mr. Herbert Putnam's assumption of his duties as the working head of the Boston Public Library coincided practically with the occupancy of the magnificent new edifice on Copley Square. He was previously connected with the Minneapolis Public Library, and being a son of the well-known New York publisher, George P. Putnam, he has naturally been familiar from his boyhood with a great range of literature. His brother, George Haven Putnam, is specially identified with the international copyright movement. Boston is fortunate in having the services of so competent a man and of one who believes in making the advantages of the library available to all classes in the community.

What and how many text-books shall be used in the work of the schoolroom is a question not of library science but of pedagogics. The increasing tendency toward oral instruction may reduce the number within the limits desired by Matthew Arnold, who, in a letter to Miss Arnold, dated December, 1877, says: "My great desire in education is to get a few good books universally taught and read. I think twenty is about all I would have, in the direct teaching of the young and to be learnt as text-books. Young people may read for themselves collaterally as much as they like." This, however, assumes that the term text-book shall itself be limited, perhaps to the one manual in each study that is to form the basis of systematic instruction and in itself represent the skeleton structure of the course. Partaking, however, of the nature of text-books is a class of books used for what is called collateral reading (geographical readers, natural history readers, etc.) provided that we limit this term to such books as, though less didactic in style, are still systematic in structure and in effect parallel the text-book, though with greater abundance of illustration and charm of style.

Beyond this class is "supplementary reading." This may then include books not attempting a systematic presentation, but whose service is, as literature, to bring the subject into relation with literature and life.

Distinctions such as the above are useful, because at the outset of any scheme of co-operation between a library and the schools the question arises: What class of books is it the function of the school authorities to supply, and what remain to be supplied by the library? Whatever books may be termed the apparatus of the classroom should presumably be furnished by the school authorities. Text-books proper would be such; books for analysis in the classroom might reasonably be contended to be such. They are books selected from the main body of literature (as Ivanhoe, Evangeline etc.), read and reported upon by the individual pupils and discussed by the class as a whole. They are to the study of literature what the Apollo Belvedere might be in the study of art, or a flower or leaf in the study of botany—specimens for observation and analysis. A practical reason for grouping them with the material to be supplied by the school authorities is that, like text books, they represent but a few titles which must be supplied in a great number of copies and whose use is reiterated from year to year.

But, besides the text-books and books for analysis, there are a few reference-books needed for such constant use that they should be a part of the apparatus of the classroom—an encyclopedia, a gazetteer, dictionaries and certain manuals.

The library may then be looked to (1) for material to be used in the work of topical research; (2) for "supplementary reading"; (3) for general literature.

1. Topical research was formerly confined to secondary instruction, and comparison, even of the varying views of several writers, was assumed to be too difficult for pupils who were yet called upon for the much more difficult work of original composition. Now, happily, it is recognized that the critical faculty comes earlier in childhood than the creative, and topical research is in some degree introduced as a feature in our common school work. Whatever its value as an element of instruction on the particular subject, its value in teaching the proper use of books cannot be overestimated. It gives opportunity at the outset for teaching the use of the tools of the student—bibliographies, catalogues, reference-books; the function of preface, index, table of contents; the purpose and methods of classification.

Comparison of authorities has value as representing the judicial method in study, but it has value also in affirming and illustrating the difference between the literature of power and the literature of knowledge. It serves to make clear that while books of the former class are to be read, books of the latter class are to be culled from; that while the former are to be tested by the pleasure they give, the test of the latter is their success in answering specific inquiry. You do the student better service by inducing him to compare what three historians of differing views have said about one event than by inducing him to read what one historian has said about a hundred events. There is a faculty of observation to be cultivated in the field of literature, as in the field of science. An excellent exercise in literature, as in history, is to assign for reading certain of Plutarch's Lives, pair by pair, withholding the "comparisons," to call upon the pupils themselves to make the comparisons, and then to discuss these with the comparisons made by Plutarch himself. "Comparison of authorities" involves analysis of statement rather than analysis of character, but is similarly serviceable in the training of the critical faculty.

Now for this topical research, for comparison of authorities, the library itself should be the place of work. If a few books are selected out and sent to the school, the instruction in the use of library tools and the influence of larger contact are lost. Where schools are so remote from the library that daily access is impractical, visits should be arranged for at periodic intervals, say once a week.

2, 3. Supplementary reading; general literature. The limits here are indefinite, the methods more or less indifferent. The purpose being to render more vivid the facts of systematic instruction by appeals to the imagination, the range of literature is wide, the selection need be less formal, more may be left to the individual taste. The taste for good books, like other tastes, is a matter chiefly of association. If the pupil could be turned loose in a fairly large collection of good literature, and the initial impulse given by introducing him to some one of a class of books that was certain to interest him, he would be safe to proceed from that point on. But the initial impulse must be given, and given in a judicious way. The essential in supplementary reading is to interest, the incidental only is to instruct.

Here and there is some shyness of supplementary reading, on the ground that both teachers and pupils already have "work enough" to do. In answer it may be said that the purpose of supplementary reading is not to add new studies, but to render more vivid those already pursued, and to bring these into proper relation with life. Four-fifths of these pupils will step from the school direct into the business of life. The text-book is certain to be left behind them; whether other books go with them will depend. Unless already they have become loved for their own sake, they, also, will be left behind, and with them the opportunity for carrying forward into active life the academic spirit and whatever of conservative influence it may exert.

Hence comes the gain to the ends of instruction itself, in fostering in the school the love of good books for their own sake, since through them, chiefly, the influence of the school is to persist. The gain to the library is obvious: for the school children of today are the "general readers" of tomorrow. The gain to the community lies in utilizing to the full agencies already in existence. Here are these thousands of children brought together daily; here is a corps of teachers whose duty and whose opportunity it is to study these children, to guide them, to caution them, but, above all, to awaken enthusiasm in them. Not to utilize this energy seems a waste of mechanism. There is no longer the excuse that books for children are either sensational or lackadaisical. Plenty of them there now are which are wholesome and yet certain to interest, which children need only taste to hunger for.

Within my limits to illustrate is not feasible; but I summarize the plan which has been laid out for co-operation between the Boston Public Library and the Boston public schools, and the main features of which are being introduced as opportunity offers and funds permit:

1. The school committee to continue to supply all text-books and books for analysis in the classroom, and such few reference-books as are required for constant use in the classroom.
